

Acknowledgments

Schilling recorded the acknowledgments that he would have made had his book come to fruition. He listed Nancy Huntington, Renata Minerbi, Lisa Henderson, and Holly Stabler, and to those names may be added individuals with whom he discussed the work as it progressed. These included his wife, Jane P. M. Schilling, as well as the interview participant and family friend J. Kenneth Mansfield, institute director William T. R. Fox, and Schilling's fellow academic experts Richard E. Neustadt, Roger Hilsman, Paul Y. Hammond, and David B. Truman. Young is thereby indirectly indebted to these individuals, and, of course, to all those whom Schilling interviewed.

He is directly indebted to many more. Foremost among them are Warner Schilling's sons, Jonathan and Derick, who agreed to entrust their father's research material to him. As it happened, they did far more than this, acting as a continuing conduit of information, as critical reviewers of draft chapters, and as providers of enthusiastic support and encouragement. Jonathan acted as the principal point of contact with the family and contributed his own considerable scholarly knowledge of the issues addressed in this book, as well as a perspective on his father's teaching and writing over many years—together with a fastidious regard for language. He plumbed his father's lecture notes and other material to offer many useful insights that Young could take up as he judged best. Jonathan Schilling generously accepted Young's decision to take the story in a rather different direction from that his father would have chosen, and supported that endeavor with items from the Schilling archive. Those inputs were invaluable and ensured that the Schilling "voice" would be heard. (And in turn Jonathan and Derick are extremely grateful to Young for his original idea and his subsequent efforts in bringing their father's research and work to full light.) Young of course takes responsibility for the themes, interpretations, and conclusions that run through the account that appears in these pages.

Young also thanks King's College, London, for awarding an undergraduate research fellowship to Jonathan Powley, who helped gather archival material during the summer vacation of 2016. Jonathan's commitment and professionalism were beyond his years and much appreciated. Simon Ertz at Stanford University gave excellent help with the LeBaron papers. Also appreciated is the meticulous help with searching and accessing US archival material provided by Thomas M. Culbert, former US Air Force officer, historian, and friend. As ever, historical research owes much to the professionalism and kindness of the archivists. Particular mention should be made here of Lynn Gamma at the Air Force Historical Research Agency; Craig Wright at the Hoover Presidential Library; Randy Sowell at the Truman Presidential Library; Kevin Bailey at the Eisenhower Presidential Library; Alicia Kubas, government publications and regional depository librarian at the University of Minnesota; and Ginny Kilander at the American Heritage Center of the University of Wyoming. Joseph Siracusa, a leading analyst of nuclear weapons and international security at the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology, kindly read the preliminary draft of the manuscript and contributed his characteristically perceptive advice. Cornell University Press provided insightful comments from an anonymous external reader and from one of the press's own series editors, while Roger Malcolm Haydon gave continuous support and encouragement.

In-depth immersion in research can often be a trial to a scholar's friends, who, while not named here, will know who they are and will doubtless be glad that the project has concluded. Finally, among all these debts, the unwavering love and support of Young's wife, Ioanna, proved once again to be beyond price and is, as ever, the most deeply felt.

London, 2018

Unbeknownst to me until very late in the process of working with Ken on this project, he was dealing with cancer during most of this time, and in February 2019 he lost his battle with it. I always knew that this project would involve one author who was no longer alive, but it has been hard for me to fathom that both of them are gone.

Before his health completely failed him, Ken submitted a final manuscript, and that, together with a few clarifications and minor additions to the text, along with the usual amount of copyediting, is what you read here. Ken was forced to prioritize content over citation, so in a number of instances sources have been added by Derick Schilling and myself where the submitted manuscript was lacking them. Some of these sources may be ones that Ken never saw. But in no cases have any changes to the historical interpretations in his manuscript been made.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In this work, special thanks have to go to Derick, whose ability to closely read historical writing is unsurpassed. Many of the same people or institutions that Ken mentioned above, as well as the American Philosophical Society, have provided help with checking archival sources. Finally, thanks go to the editors at Cornell University Press for their patience and assistance.
