

Acknowledgments

People often say writing a book is like running a marathon. Having only done one of the two, I cannot quite confirm the analogy. But it has certainly been a long run, and I am excited to have the opportunity to thank everyone who helped along the way.

This book's origins go back to Duke University. My greatest intellectual debt is to Alex Downes. Ever since I started as his lowly research assistant in 2009, Alex has been a fantastic mentor and friend as he taught me how to navigate the strange world of academia. My time at Duke also brought the good fortune of meeting several other advisers who helped get this project off the ground. Erik Wibbels is always the smartest person in the room, and I hope at least a tiny bit of his intellect rubbed off on me. Laia Balcells joined our department halfway through my time at Duke, and it took all of my self-control to give her a few days on campus before I started asking her for advice. Peter Feaver pushed me to think seriously about the policy implications of academic work and consistently found pockets of research money for which I will always be grateful.

I completed this book as a faculty member at Northwestern University. I have been lucky to benefit from the insights of all my colleagues in Scott Hall, but a few deserve special recognition for generously taking the time to offer detailed feedback on my book. I hope Hendrik Spruyt, Karen Alter, Steve Nelson, Will Reno, Marina Henke, Ana Arjona, Jay Seawright, Andrew Roberts, and Robert Braun will notice their fingerprints scattered across these pages. Al Tillery has been a tireless advocate since I arrived in Evanston. The J+ happy hour group gets credit for helping maintain my sanity. Thanks also to the smart students at Northwestern (especially Alex Deckler, my former undergraduate research assistant for this book) who make my job so fun and fulfilling.

My book manuscript underwent the equivalent of major surgery during a workshop in April 2017. I thank Hein Goemans, Paul Staniland, and Alex Downes (yet again) for traveling to Evanston to participate in the all-day workshop. For someone whose work crosses the boundaries of international security, civil war, and political leadership, this trio was as good as the 1992 Dream Team. I am sure they can see the difference they made in the final version of the book.

I have racked up a slew of thank-yous owed to other colleagues over the past several years. Keeping track of them all has been a challenge, but I want to express my gratitude for helpful comments and insightful conversations to Ben Barber, Kyle Beardsley, Andy Bell, Andy Bennett, Stephen Chaudoin, Jeff Colgan, Mark Crescenzi, Sarah Croco, Chris DeSante, Cassy Dorff, Abel Escrivà-Folch, Max Gallop, Chris Gelpi, Stephen Gent, Thomas Gift, Charlie Glaser, Emilie Hafner-Burton, Larry Helfer, Courtney Hillebrecht, Florian Hollenbach, Mike Horowitz, Hyeran Jo, Michael Joseph, Judith Kelley, Ashley Leeds, Bahar Leventoglu, Jack Levy, Yon Lupu, Jacqueline McAllister, Sara Mitchell, Monika Nalepa, Andy Owsiaik, Andy Reiter, Elizabeth Saunders, Greg Schoeber, Anna Schultz, Kathryn Sikkink, Richard Steinberg, Ben Valentino, Erik Voeten, Michael Weintraub, and Simon Weschle. My sincere apologies to anyone I have forgotten. My coauthors from a pair of previous projects—Thomas Gift and Abel Escrivà-Folch—deserve a special shout-out for their advice and friendship.

Several institutions provided fellowships and financial support that allowed me to conduct the research for this book. For their generosity, I thank the National Science Foundation, the Harry Frank Guggenheim Foundation, the Bradley Foundation, the Graduate School at Duke University, the Elliott School of International Affairs at George Washington University, and the program on Equality Development and Globalization Studies at Northwestern University.

At Cornell University Press, I had the pleasure of working with Roger Haydon, whose legendary reputation in the field is well deserved. During the review process, I was lucky to receive a set of extraordinarily thoughtful anonymous comments (whoever you are, thank you). I also thank the editors of the Cornell Studies in Security Affairs series for including my book among such distinguished company.

Some portions of this book, most notably the statistical analysis presented in chapter 3, are loosely derived from my article “Should I Stay or Should I Go? Leaders, Exile, and the Dilemmas of International Justice,” published in American Journal of Political Science 62, no. 2 (April 2018): 486–98.

On a more personal note, I thank my family. My parents, Mark and Laurie, offered much-appreciated enthusiasm as I embarked on a somewhat unexpected career path. Little did they know that all those trips to the South Bend Public Library would eventually result in my decision to write a book. My siblings, Kathleen and Tommy, deserve credit for keeping it real by teasing me about some of my “professorial” tendencies. Last but certainly not least, I thank my wife, Laura. More than anyone else, she guided me through the highs and lows of wrestling with this project for nearly a decade. Not only has she read several drafts of this book (except for this paragraph!) but her love and support also helped me get through the days when I thought about giving up. I dedicate this book to her. And just days before submitting the final draft of this manuscript, our son, Theodore, entered the world. The next one is for him.
