ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In writing this book I have benefited greatly from the input and support of many colleagues, students, and friends. Some answered specific research questions; others asked just the right questions of my research. Some made possible a venue for presenting my work in progress; others offered advice on specific aspects of that work. Some read and responded to early versions of chapters; others offered encouragement and support along the way. I thank you all: Erik Born, Ximena Briceño, Suzanne Buchan, Paul Buchholz, Sabine Doran, Eric Downing, Paul Flaig, Paul Fleming, Carl Gelderloos, Peter Gilgen, Eric Hayot, Laura Helton, Brook Henkel, Héctor Hoyos, Ilinca Iurascu, Anton Kaes, Julia Karolle-Berg, Michele Kennerly, Catriona MacLeod, Hannah Matangos, Patrizia McBride, Petra McGillen, Christopher Moore, Brad Prager, Daniel Purdy, Gonzalo Rubio, Anette Schwarz, Matt Tierney, Rochelle Tobias, Peter Utz, Adrian Wanner, William Waters, and Henning Wrage.

Special thanks go to Lea Pao for her enthusiasm and shrewd insights and for always being there to answer my questions about obscure German locutions, to Jeri Peck for teaching me about moss, and to Andrew Langridge for introducing me to Fischinger's Walking from Munich to Berlin. Drafts of different parts of the book were presented at Cornell University, Stanford University, Johns Hopkins University, Gettysburg College, and the University of California, Berkeley, as well as at the German Media Inventories Workshops at Dartmouth College and the University of Missouri, Columbia. I am grateful to the organizers of these events (whose names appear above) for the invitations and to the audiences for their incisive questions and feedback.

The first version of what would become chapter 2 was written while on faculty fellowship at Penn State's Center for Humanities and Information. The whole project was shaped by this semester and the intellectual exchange fostered by the director Eric Hayot. Chrisann Zuerner was my research assistant for one summer. Her help was indispensable. As successive heads of my department, Richard Page and Tom Beebee were essential to providing the needed time for research and writing. Archival research conducted at Yale's Beinecke Library was made by possible by a grant from the Botstiber Institute for Austrian-American Studies. The holdings at the Center for Visual Music, Los Angeles, were critical to writing chapter 3 on Oskar Fischinger. I am grateful to the director Cindy Keefer for accommodating me and for granting me permission to use two images from the archive. Some last-minute research for chapter 3 was carried out at the Cinematek in Brussels. I am appreciative of Nicolas Dernoncourt for making that visit and the subsequent writing possible. My father was always there for me when I needed something; his collection of Glauser in English, which he mailed to me at the drop of a hat, made adding translations to chapter 7 much easier.

A writing group consisting of Jonathan E. Abel, Benjamin Schreyer, and Jens Guettel provided support in the final stages of the project, even if that support was more moral (and of course bibulous) than always scholarly. The "Crew" in State College—Jessamyn Abel, Jon Abel, Jennifer Boittin, and Jens Guettel, as well as Ben and Oliver—was a constant and essential source of support: intellectual, nutritional, and emotional. Numerous conversations with them about all aspects of the project made its successful completion easier.

Three colleagues provided more than the usual amount of feedback on drafts. Jon Abel read more than half the book at a critical stage and helped me figure out how to move forward with key parts of it. David Rando read and provided excellent feedback on the introduction, chapter 1, and the conclusion. His input during final revisions was also critical. Finally, Sean Franzel carefully read early drafts of well over half the book, giving me detailed comments on almost every page. I am lucky to have such generous scholars as friends. The book would not be what it is without their insights and support.

Two anonymous readers for Cornell University Press provided exemplary feedback and suggestions for revisions that made the book stronger. I would also like to thank Kizer Walker and the Signale editorial board for their support. One member of the board deserves special mention: Leslie Adelson provided vital suggestions that helped me to reshape the conclusion. Above all I am grateful to Peter Hohendahl for believing in the project and for shepherding it to publication.

Finally, I thank Maryam and Henry, without whom none of this would have been possible.

A version of chapter 2 originally appeared as "Cryptogamic Phylogeny: Moss and Family Lineage in Adalbert Stifter's 'Der Kuß von Sentze,'" in Flüchtigkeit der Moderne: Eigenzeiten des Ephemeren im langen 19. Jahrhundert, edited by Michael Bies, Sean Franzel, and Dirk Oschmann (Hannover: Wehrhahn Verlag, 2017). Chapter 3 first appeared sans the Marclay coda and with a different frame in Animation: An Interdisciplinary Journal, vol. 8, no. 3 (2013) as "Cinematic Collecting: The Continuous Discontinuity of the Still Frame in Oskar Fischinger's Walking from Munich to Berlin." And a slightly different version of chapter 4 titled "God's Trash? Theodicy of Things and the Paradox of Productive Refuse in Jeremias Gotthelf's 'Die Wassernot im Emmental'" originally appeared in Entsorgungsprobleme: Müll in der Literatur, a special issue of Zeitschrift für deutsche Philologie (2014) edited by David-Christopher Assmann, Norbert Otto Eke, and Eva Geulen. I thank the editors and presses for permission to reuse these publications here.
