

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I would like to express my gratitude to a host of individuals and institutions that were indispensable to the completion of this book. First, I am indebted to those Chinese peasants who provided me with hospitality, accommodations, and above all, their often painful memories of village life during the Great Leap famine. Over the years my two colleagues in China and I have managed to interview 141 peasants across 44 villages and have gathered information from many other peasants who voluntarily spoke up at the interview scenes but departed the discussion before we were able to note their names. We also had the opportunity to interview 40 former cadres at 17 county and town seats and cities, the majority of whom had previously served as rural cadres at the county and people's commune levels. Their insights enriched our understanding of policy issues at the grassroots level. Although I have finally managed to integrate all their narratives into this book, I feel a profound sense of regret that during the long process of writing most of these villagers passed away. Many had expressed a wish to see their poignant stories in print, even in a foreign language they could not read.

Second, my gratitude goes to my Chinese colleagues, friends, and former classmates who assisted me. In Anhui Province, Chen Yiyun, Fang Xiangdong, He Xiaogang, Hu Weixing, Huang Jingxiu, Huang Wenzhi, Li Chenglei, Pang Zhengxiang, Peng Keming, Pu Haihong, Shen Kui, Wang Shuobai, Yu Side, and Zhu Lening were instrumental in facilitating visits to villages, often those of their parents, relatives, or friends. They not only introduced me to the villagers and arranged accommodations in villagers' homes but also provided translations from local dialects into Mandarin. Most importantly, they convinced villagers to engage with me as an interview partner. In Jiangxi Province, similar support was extended by Qiu Xinyou and Xiao Tangbiao. My special thanks go to Shen Kui of the Anhui Academy of Social Sciences and Wang Shuobai of Anhui University, who consented to collaborate on this research and conducted a number of interviews themselves. I also want to acknowledge the assistance of several Chinese colleagues and friends who wish to remain anonymous.

My gratitude must include a number of institutions. I benefited tremendously from the rich collection of the Universities Service Center for China Studies at the Chinese University of Hong Kong, and additionally from the center's research grants, which supported me for two summers of study there. Anhui University hosted my early research trips and allowed me to use its library. My special thanks go to the university's foreign affairs office, which clarified my scholarly status to its superior authorities and enabled me to conduct interviews in the countryside. I am grateful to the Anhui Provincial Office of Local Chronicles (Difangzhi bangongshi) for arranging a special meeting with me, which allowed me to learn how the institutions at the provincial and county levels collected and compiled archival sources into the local chronicles that I cite extensively in this book. I also thank the Institute of Modern Anhui Studies of the Anhui Academy of Social Sciences and the History Department of Shanghai Jiaotong University for sharing with me their collection of source materials.

My school, the University of North Carolina Wilmington, has been my primary supporter. Through its summer initiatives, Cahill Awards, and research reassignments, UNCW provided me generous and continued financial assistance that made several trips to Chinese villages possible and also permitted me time to write. In addition, the Department of History at UNCW assisted me with its Mosley Awards for my travel to China over the years.

I have benefited significantly from the patience and guidance of many scholars. Peter Coclanis of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and Ralph Thaxton of Brandeis University each gave my manuscript a close reading. Many other colleagues read one or more chapters or discussed some of my chapters as conference papers or invited talks. I thank Stephen Averill of Michigan State University, Cao Shuji of Shanghai Jiaotong University, Kathryn Edgerton-Tarpley of San Diego State University, Denys Leighton of Jindal Global University, Lilian M. Li of Swarthmore College, Kimberley Manning of Concordia University, Ramon Myers of the Hoover Institution, Cormac Ó Gráda of University College Dublin, Liu Shigu of Beijing University, Felix Wemheuer of the University of Cologne, Dali Yang of the University of Chicago, and Zheng Haolan of Keio University. I thank Anthony Garnaut of the University of Melbourne, William Kirby of Harvard University, and James Kung of the Hong Kong Polytechnic University for their conversations and encouragement in this research. I especially thank Jin Guantao, Jing Hung, Pierre Landry, and Liu Qingfeng of the Chinese University of Hong Kong for their numerous discussions with me about my research and source materials. Two anonymous readers provided detailed and constructive criticism that helped me improve the quality of my arguments and writing.

At the University of North Carolina Wilmington, my colleagues Kathleen Berkeley, Venkat Dhulipala, Susan McCaffrey, Lynn Moltenauer, Lisa Pollard, Michael Seidman, Mark Spaulding, and Paul Townend provided steady encouragement and support by reading my research proposals and manuscript chapters and supporting my applications for research funding. I am especially grateful to Mark Spaulding for reading and editing a lengthy manuscript. Of course, I take full responsibility for any errors of fact or interpretation in this book.

I extend my gratitude to Cornell University Press. I am thankful to Jim Lance for his initial review of my manuscript and words of encouragement. I express my deep appreciation for Marlyn Miller's meticulous copyediting; her keen eye and insightful suggestions enhanced and strengthened this manuscript significantly and her work proved to be invaluable. Additionally, I would like to thank cartographer Bill Nelson and indexer Lisa DeBoer, whose contributions perfected this book.

Finally, I would like to express my deepest appreciation to my wife, Min Yu, who endured my frequent absences during research trips. All her encouragement and support over the years has helped me to shape this book.
