

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The contributions of many kind and generous people helped make this book possible. I am grateful to the editors at Cornell University Press, the editorial board of the Signale series, the production staff at Westchester Publishing Services, and the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript; insightful comments from all these individuals helped make The Feeling of the Form a stronger book. In particular, I would like to thank Paul Fleming, Kristen Gregg, Mahinder Kingra, Mary Kate Murphy, and Kizer Walker at CUP; Abigail Michaud and the copyeditors at Westchester Publishing; and Rachel Lyon for creating the index. At the University of Utah, this book was supported by the University Research Committee (URC), which awarded me valuable leave time to work on the study. The contents of the book are solely my responsibility and do not necessarily represent the official views of the URC, the Vice President for Research Office, or the University of Utah. Margaret Toscano, then chair of the Department of World Languages and Cultures, along with the URC and university administration, provided crucial support in rescheduling the leave when circumstances made this necessary.

Conferences of the American Comparative Literature Association and the International Rilke Society offered me the opportunity to workshop ideas that would later become important to the book, as did the Awe and Attention Symposium at the University of Utah. Audience comments by Biddy Martin on a presentation I gave many decades ago helped me think about the question of flows in Stifter; the results of this line of thought influenced part of the trajectory of my reading of Der Hochwald in this book's second chapter. Some of the ideas in that section of the chapter, as well as some parts of my discussion of Rilke's essay "Über den Dichter" in chapter 3, were also originally developed in substantially different form in my previous writings.

Ongoing conversations about philosophy, virtual reality, technology, and nature with my friend and colleague Alf Seegert at the University of Utah helped inspire some of the concerns of the book; Alf additionally read and provided valuable feedback on an early draft of chapter 1. Karin Baumgartner, Scott Black, Vince Cheng, Katharina Gerstenberger, and Matt Potolsky, also friends and colleagues at the University of Utah, commented on early versions of the first chapter, reviewed the prospectus, suggested authors relevant to the study, or helped me think through crucial aspects of the revision process. Classroom dialogue with students in my courses "Empathy, Medicine, and the Human Condition," "The Sublime," "Aesthetics-Empathy-Form," and "German Realism" helped energize my continuing engagement with the book's sphere of ideas. Outside the University of Utah, Haun Saussy offered helpful comments, and Tobias Wilke provided a difficult-to-obtain document.

Numerous friends, family members, and mentors sustained me throughout the years before, during, and after the writing of the book. My parents, Archie and Dora Metz, who did not live to see the completion of this book, were my first and continuous sources of love and support; in many ways, they inspired me to enter academia to begin with. My friends Roy Bjellquist, Doug Cogan, Thérèse De Raedt, Rainer Orth, Ralf Saborrosch, Margaret Toscano, and others continue to weave me into a tapestry of love and meaning. Teachers from college, graduate school, and beyond have shaped my thinking. I will not attempt to put into words the debt I owe Lama Thupten Dorje Gyaltsen Rinpoche. And it would also be impossible to express the depth of my love and gratitude for my wife Claudia and my children Ben and Alexander. Many others who cannot be listed by name also played a role in the emergence of this book; I acknowledge them here. In the broadest sense, I acknowledge and thank the totality without which neither this book nor anything else would be possible.
