

Acknowledgments

This book has been written in fits and starts over a number of years. It should have been finished much sooner, but births, relocations, separations, unions, continuing duties, and new challenges punctuated its completion. In substance, it has been expanded and revised almost unrecognizably beyond its first iteration, but first thanks are due to my early mentors. From the very beginning Afsaneh Najmabadi was quick to respond to questions and messy drafts, and kept me conceptually accountable. In addition to being an amazing scholar from whom I had the honor of learning a great deal, she gave me the freedom to follow my interests, which wended their way across time and space. Over the years Engseng Ho challenged me to keep the big picture in mind and to take my thinking in new directions. With good humor and integrity Paul Losensky has provided guidance and feedback, both general and pinpointed, as well as most gracious support. Sunil Sharma literally spent years reading these and other Persian texts with me; I owe an incalculable debt to him for his generosity as a teacher and a friend.

My sense of being in the world is one in which connection to friends and family is crucial. My grandmother Betty Parviz's stories first set me on this path and I still miss her every day. I am grateful for my extended maternal family (especially Hamid, Shahnaz, Mojdeh, Omid, Mandana, Rodolphe, Arash, Mona), who act as an anchor in my life. My mother, Soosan Yeganegi, and my cousin, Farbod Mirfakhrai, were especially supportive and encouraging. My aunt, Zohreh Sullivan, encouraged my love of books and writing from the very beginning. Mowgli Holmes and Tara Nolan have always felt like family, and their friendship has been a refuge for over two decades. Bahareh Mahdi has loved me with amazing generosity for over thirty years, even during my most annoying and sanctimonious phases.

Talking things through is a large part of my thinking process, and over the years I have benefited from the engagement and advice of many mentors, friends, and colleagues from my student days: Sebouh Aslanian, Kathryn Babayan, Alireza Doostdar, Philip Grant, Rajeev Kinra, Darryl Li, Derek Mancini-Lander, Dan Sheffield, Nick Smith, Naghmeh Sohrabi, and Mohamad Tavakoli. In particular, I would not have survived Cambridge without Eric Beverley, Sarah Waheed, Nicole Brown, and Sam Bayard.

I am also grateful for the funding and professional opportunities that supported this project. I began preliminary research with an Arthur Lehman Merit Fellowship in fall 2006 from Harvard University. In 2007–2008, I went to London, Delhi, and Tehran with a Frederick Sheldon Travelling Fellowship from Harvard. I would never have survived the mean streets of Delhi without the friendship of Neichu Angami and Sarah Waheed. Once in India, I was able to travel to Patna with a Tata Study Grant from the South Asia Initiative at Harvard. Dr. Imtiyaz Ahmad at the Khuda Bakhsh Library provided me with instrumental assistance. In Tehran, Drs. Susan Ghahremani and Hossein Doostdar graciously hosted and guided me during my stay. I am also grateful to Saiedeh Karimi for her assistance and friendship. I wrote most of the chapters on which this book is based with a dissertation completion fellowship from the American Council of Learned Societies (ACLS), before putting it aside. I then spent two years of education and engagement on what has come to be a second project at the Max Planck Institute for Human Development's Center for the History of Emotions. I picked this book up again during my time at Columbia, during which I was fortunate to have presented various parts in a number of different forums: the Jordan Center for Persian Studies at UC Irvine, South Asia Colloquium at University of Pennsylvania, the workshop on Local History in the Persianate Cosmopolis at SOAS, and the Center for Middle Eastern Studies at University of Chicago. These opportunities helped me refine my arguments. I did additional research in London and Berlin with a Provost's Faculty Diversity Grant from Columbia University. Final revisions were begun and ended with two Junior Faculty Summer Research Grants from Columbia and sustained in between with the support of an SSRC/Andrew Mellon Transregional Junior Scholars Fellowship: InterAsian Contexts and Connections.

At Columbia, I benefited from the intellectual stimulation and guidance of my colleagues, especially Allison Busch, Partha Chatterjee, Patricia Dailey, Mamadou Diouf, Najam Haider, Gil Hochberg, David Lurie, Mahmood Mamdani, Brinkley Messick, Tim Mitchell, Debashree Mukherjee, Sheldon Pollock, Anupama Rao, and Emmanuelle Saada. Tenure track is quite the mental health Olympics, and the support of Manan Ahmed and Eric Beverley has been crucial. I have also benefited from engagement with and support of various other friends and colleagues: Orit Bashkin, Purnima Dhavan, Roy Fischel, Barry Flood, Behrooz Ghamari, Nile Green, Katharina Ivanyi, Arash Khazeni, Dipti Khera, Julie Livingston, Afshin Marashi, Matt Melvin-Koushki, Durba Mitra, Margrit Pernau, Christine Philliou, Robert Pluma, Sholeh Quinn, Ali Raza, Sadia Shirazi, Kamran Sullivan, and Farzin Vejdani.

Additional thanks are due to Kate Wahl at Stanford University Press for guiding me with extraordinary editorial skill to pull this book out of a manuscript nearly twice its size, as well as her efficiency in seeing it through the review and revision process. Debra Osnowitz and David Horne's editorial skills helped me polish this manuscript into something more readable.

I am especially thankful for (and to) my beloved companion, Gil Anidjar, whose brilliance, thoughtfulness, and ferocious engagement have been a singular joy. Though we have parted ways, I must also thank my former husband, A. Seth Young, for the years we spent together and for our daughter, Rassa June. It is to her that this book is dedicated, with love and the deepest gratitude. I was a single parent the last year that I worked on this book, and she helped me remember what is really important.

This page intentionally left blank