Gratitude is a small word for a big feeling. This book would not have been possible without the mentorship, friendship, solidarity, and generosity of many. Like the word “gratitude,” each name that appears in these few pages is a small unit of proper nouns that represents a profound contribution.

The genesis of this book lies in my undergraduate years at Wellesley College. Many thanks to Rachid Aadnani for letting me into first-year Arabic by overriding the enrollment cap. Through years of patient Arabic instruction and seminars in modern North African literature, Rachid has shaped a cohort of Morocco enthusiasts. Louise Marlow directed the Middle East Studies program at Wellesley and taught several critical courses in the Religion Department, giving me a rich background in history and thought in the region. Anjali Prabhu introduced me to the world of Francophone Maghribi literature, as well as the wide, rich world of postcolonial critical theory. Anjali encouraged and challenged me, advising me on an undergraduate senior thesis on questions of Muslim and Jewish exile in post–World War II literature in North Africa. Frances Malino’s course, Jews of Muslim Lands, launched my interest in Jewish history in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA). Fran was and remains a paragon of critical scholarship, mentorship, and friendship. Fran read this manuscript in its entirety during the summer of 2019 and provided critical feedback and encouragement. More than a mentor, Fran is family.

Sarah Abrevaya Stein advised me through the PhD program at UCLA and continues to provide unparalleled mentorship and support. This book would not exist without Sarah's critical eye, uncompromising research rigor, and narrative structuring brilliance (Sarah suggested the chapter title progression for this book). Sarah is a model of scholarly achievement and acumen, as well as generosity. David N. Myers has been a rigorous interlocutor, asking difficult questions and helping me hone this project into one in conversation with multiple fields within Jewish history, including modern European Jewish history and the historiography of Zionism. Susan Gilson Miller, a founding figure in modern North African history, trained me in Maghribi historiography and lent her keen expertise to shaping this project since its earliest stages, generously sharing material relevant to several chapters and reading multiple drafts. James L. Gelvin trained me in the historiography of the modern Middle East and pushed me to consider how the history of Moroccan Jewish Communists relates not only to the modern history of the region and modern Jewish history but also to the history of other minorities in the modern Middle East; Jim provided invaluable suggestions and questions from the earliest stages of the project. In addition to providing guidance on the project from the beginning, Susan Slyomovics introduced me to Jean and Jacques Lévy, as well as Sion Assidon, for which I am very grateful.

A host of other scholars and mentors deserve a great deal of gratitude. Aomar Boum has been a friend and mentor since before I began graduate school, providing support, research advice, archive material, editorial suggestions, and connections. Daniel Schroeter, another founding figure in Moroccan Jewish historiography, read many chapter drafts and provided detailed commentary; he has been incredibly kind and generous with time, resources, and his intellect. Jessica Maya Marglin is a meticulous scholar who has helped shape this project from when I met her in Rabat in 2009 and had not yet started graduate school; she read drafts of this manuscript, providing invaluable guidance and insight. Emily Benichou Gottreich read versions of this project and lent tremendous insight through years of scholarly interactions, as well as giving me access to documents in her possession. Ethan B. Katz read a draft manuscript as part of a UCHRI-funded Junior Faculty Manuscript Workshop at UC Santa Cruz in February 2019 and raised important questions and suggestions that have brought the work into its current form.

Lior B. Sternfeld read the manuscript in its entirety just before I submitted it to Stanford University Press; he not only improved the manuscript quality with his questions and comments but also provided the last bit of encouragement when it seemed I could no longer read the words on the page. Jonathan Wyrzten gave valuable critique—he also suggested the title The Sultan's Communists at a meeting of the Yale Jewish History Colloquium in fall 2018; I am grateful to Michael Rom for inviting me and to the attendees, including David Sorkin and Tsivia Frank. Orit Bashkin, Joel Beinin, David Biale, Constance Pâris de Bollardi re, Lia Brozgal, Michelle U. Campos, Julia Clancy-Smith, Julia Phillips Cohen, Paris Papamichos Chronakis, Leena Dallahsheh, Naomi Davidson, Omnia El-Shakry, Olivia Harrison, Liora Halperin, Mohammed Hatimi, Oren Kosansky, Daniel Lee, Pierre-Jean Le Foll Luciani, Elizabeth Marcus, Devi Mays, Tony Michels, Bryan K. Roby, Aron Rodrigue, Aline Schlaepfer, Joshua Schreier, Ben Schreier, David Stenner, Nick Underwood, and Orit Ouaknine Yekutieli all played important roles in shaping this work.

Between undergrad and graduate school, I received a Fulbright grant to Morocco. It was there that I met Simon L vy, the Moroccan Jewish Communist who inspired me to write this book. At the time, he was the director of the Moroccan Jewish Heritage Foundation and Museum in Casablanca. L vy's jokes, conversation, generous lunches, and more launched this project. Zhor Rehihil, the Jewish Heritage Foundation and Museum's curator and, since Simon's death, its director as well, kindly allowed me to interview her and mentored me. Mohammed Kenbib, the noted and prolific historian of the Moroccan Jewish past at Mohammed V University in Rabat, served as a valuable mentor during the Fulbright year. Jama  Ba ida, a scholar of the Moroccan Jewish press and director of the Royal National Archives, provided many valuable insights in developing this project. Vanessa Paloma introduced me to the contemporary Jewish community of Casablanca and provided friendship, event invitations, and pro-tips to studying contemporary Jewish life in Morocco. Mohamed Dellal helped with research into Vichy-era forced labor camp sites. James Miller, Saadia Maski, and the whole Fulbright gang of that year enabled this work: they include Sam Anderson, Kristen Johnson, Kimberly Junmookda, Caitlyn Olson, Stacy Pancratz, Megan Pavlishek, Lauren Peate, Weston Sager, Kendra Salois, Rod Solaimani, Rebecca Slenes, Matthew Streib, Anissa Talantikite, Cath Thompson, and Andrew Watrous.

When I traveled back to Morocco for further research in 2013, Simon Lévy had passed away, but his sons Jean and Jacques Lévy, as well as Simon's wife Incarnation, were unwavering in their generosity in giving me access to Simon's personal papers and library and providing interviews. Jean and Jacques also generously read and provided comments and corrections for this book. Incarnation, who has since died, hosted me for two months' worth of long lunches and stimulating conversation while I worked in Simon's library. It is with great sadness that I report that Jean Lévy, too, passed away in the winter of 2020—Jean had provided me invaluable access to materials and his own time, in addition to continuing his father's work restoring Jewish sites across Morocco. Sion Assidon, André Azoulay, Maurice Serfaty, and Fahd Yata were generous with their time and stories in agreeing to sit for interviews. The leaders of the Parti du progrès et du socialisme (PPS) of Morocco, in particular Nabil Benabdallah, were enthusiastic and helpful in finding rare items for this project, notably the photo of Léon René Sultan. Raphaël (Ralph) Benarrosh shared with me original documents from his time in the Moroccan Communist Party and allowed me to interview him at his home in Paris. Khalid El Ghali and Myriem Khrouz were generous with their time and resources at the Royal National Library of Morocco.

At UC Santa Cruz, Nathaniel Deutsch has been the ideal colleague. Nathaniel read and commented on a full draft of the manuscript and multiple versions of the introduction; in addition, through our discussions about framing, he helped sharpen the book's argument. Nathaniel provided invaluable mentorship, support, and collaboration throughout the writing process. A number of others in the UCSC community provided inestimable support and critique of the project, as well as much-needed moments of levity; they include Mark Amengual, Bettina Aptheker, Murray and Sheila Baumgarten, Dorian Bell, Hunter Bivens, Benjamin Breen, Terry Burke, Vilashini Coopan, Muriam Haleh Davis, Jennifer Derr, Martin Devecka, Lindsey Dillon, Madeleine Fairbairn, Mayanthi Fernando, Renée Fox, Amy Mihyang Ginter, Camilo Gomez-Rivas, Johanna Isaacson, Kate Jones, Peter Kenez, Peter Limbrick, Kristian Lopez-Vargas, Nidhi Mahajan, Marc Matera, Samantha Matherne, Greg O'Malley, Grant McGuire, Sara Niedzwiecki, Roya Pakzad, Maya Peterson, Jackie Sue Powell, Thomas Serres, Juned Shaikh, Ajay Shenoy, Amanda Smith, Elaine Sullivan, and Bruce Thompson. I am grateful to Crystal Smith for her expert notetaking during the UCHRI-funded Junior Faculty Manuscript Workshop, to the Committee on Research (COR) at UCSC for research support grants, and to the sponsors of the Neufeld-Levin Chair in Holocaust Studies, which has supported research and production of this book. I thank Margo Irvin of Stanford University Press for her participation in the manuscript workshop in Santa Cruz in February 2019, her enthusiasm for the project, and her work toward its completion. I am also grateful to Cindy Lim and Emily Smith of Stanford University Press for their time and help in the publication process.

I spent a stimulating sabbatical in the fall of 2018 at the Herbert D. Katz Center for Advanced Judaic Studies at the University of Pennsylvania as part of the fellowship cohort, “Jewish Life in Modern Islamic Contexts.” I am grateful to Professors Samuel Z. Klausner and Roberta G. Sands for supporting this fellowship and to Steven Weitzman for facilitating and convening the group. In Philadelphia, Lital Levy and Heather Sharkey read my work, providing helpful feedback and questions. I am grateful to the other fellows at the center, who gave critical insight on the project and camaraderie: Esra Almas, Nancy Berg, Chen Bram, Dina Danon, Yuval Evri, Annie Greene, Kerstin Hünefeld, Yoram Meital, Aviad Moreno, Hadar Feldman Samet, Joseph Sassoon, Alon Tam, Alan Verskin, and Mark Wagner. At different stages, my research has been sponsored by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum Takiff Family Foundation Fellowship, the American Academy for Jewish Research, the Ralph and Sarah Monkarsh Graduate Fellowship, a UCLA Center for Jewish Studies (CJS) Bluma Appel Fellowship and a CJS Roter Research Travel Grant, the UCLA International Institute International Fieldwork Fellowship, a FLAS grant, and the Posen Society of Fellows.

The following people provided solidarity, editing, research companionship, and encouragement: Ceren Abi, Vanessa Arslanian, Reem Bailony, Beeta Baghoolizadeh, Jenna and Alex Barron, Michal Bornstein, Aubre Carreón Aguilar, Michael Casper, Jaya Aninda Chatterjee, Jeremy Epstein, Vanessa Fernández, Chris Gratien, Peter Haderlein, James Heckman, Jonathan and Darlyn Heckman, Gin Hoffman, Graham Hough-Cornwell, Selah Johnson, Samantha Keefe, Rachael Lau, Katie Levy, Pauline Lewis, Siobhan O’Keefe, Idir Ouahes, Emily Peters, Hanna Petro, Caroline Elizabeth

Robertson, Chris Silver, Eoghan Stafford, Onyx (V.) Starrett, Anoush Suni, Nefertiti Takla, Caroline Tall, Anna Thieret, Ying Wang, Jess Weyer, Jennifer Willis, and Murat Yildiz.

David Joshua Epstein was a constant source of support, humor, encouragement, editorial acumen, and unconditional love throughout this process. Although he is a medical doctor, he has become one of the world's foremost experts in modern Moroccan Jewish political history and is available to answer any reader questions.

Finally, I dedicate this book to the memory of my mother, Lynne Carol Pettler Heckman (August 8, 1949–July 8, 2017). She was my first and best editor, my most constant source of encouragement and support, who died of cancer before the completion of this work. Her favorite word was “calamity.”
