

Acknowledgments

There are many who have generously given their invaluable time to reading the manuscript in its various incarnations. I would like to thank in particular Lynn Struve, Evelyn S. Rawski, Cynthia Brokaw, Robert Hegel, and Tze-ki Hon, and my colleagues at the University of Illinois, Anne Burkus-Chasson and Janet Kelly, for their criticism and comments. There are many who have read different chapters and offered their comments and criticism. Oki Yashushi, Soren Egren, Jack Wills, and my colleagues Gary Xu, Rania Huntington, and Ueda Atsuko have generously offered their time and special knowledge.

I have also benefited from the comments and criticism from colleagues at various seminars and presentations: the Seminar of the History of the Book at Indiana University, the Mellon Dissertation Seminar at Washington University, the K. C. Liu Lecture Series at the University of California, Davis, and a presentation at the University of Hawaii. To Peter Lindenbaum, Lynn Struve, Robert Hegel, Susan Mann, and Daniel Kwok I express gratitude for providing me with great opportunities to test out my ideas. I am also indebted to Johan Hanselaer of Belgium who has kindly translated portions of his article on wages and prices in Antwerp in the sixteenth century.

From their insightful suggestions, criticism, and expertise I have learned to correct mistakes and make improvements. But I remain fully responsible for any mistake that remains in this book.

I must express gratitude to Patricia Ebrey and William Rowe, whose support and advice throughout my academic career hold special meaning. Their friendship and guidance in substantial ways facilitated the progress and completion of the project.

Many friends and librarians have provided assistance for the use and location of books. Qi Kechen and Zhou Shaoquan, Institute of History of the Academy of Social Sciences; Sue Small, School of African and Oriental Studies at the University of London; David Helliwell, Bodleian Library; Su Jing, who was formerly at the Center for Chinese Studies at the Central Library in Taipei. Other staffers at the center who had lent me valuable help include Zhang Lian and Liu Hsien-shu. Shen Jin at the Harvard-Yenching Library and Mi Chu Wiens at the Library of Congress helped me search for Ming imprints. At home, Karen Wei and her staff at the East Asian Collection of the University of Illinois Library have been forthcoming in their support throughout this endeavor. I am particularly indebted to Setsuko Noguchi for her dedication in locating titles for me.

This project originated with the plan to examine late-Ming culture through an in-depth investigation of the thought and life of Li Zhi. It gradually expanded beyond the study of Li Zhi's involvement in publishing to a comprehensive inquiry of the impact of print on late-Ming cultural practices. During its extended gestation and its various stages of mutation, this project has received generous support from various institutions and funding agencies. A grant from the Committee on Scholarly Communication with the People's Republic of China allowed me to conduct research on Ming editions in various libraries in Beijing and Shanghai. A fellowship from the Center for Chinese Studies in Taipei offered a great opportunity for me to examine the collection of late-Ming commentaries on the Four Books at the Center.

The writing of this book was facilitated by grants from various agencies. The Pacific Culture Foundation in Taipei and the Center for East Asian and Pacific Studies at the University of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana, have helped provide funding to support my writing. The Research Board and the Humanities Release Time Program at the University of Illinois have been generous with their support in grants. I am particularly grateful to George Yu, director of the Center for East Asian and Pacific Studies, for his unflagging support throughout the various stages of this project.

Thanks are also due to the National Archives of Japan for granting permission to reproduce copies of pages from four Ming imprints: Sishu tiyi, Huang Ming bai fangjia wenda, Sishu qianbai nian yan, and Chen pi lieguo zhizhuan. I am particularly grateful to Miss Yumiko Ohara at the service section of the Archival Affairs Division at the National Archives of Japan for her effective communication and professional assistance. Portions of Chapter 4 have been published in the June 1996 issue of Late Imperial China.

I would also like to thank Matt Stevens for his meticulous editing. His professionalism is highly salutary. I am truly appreciative of Muriel Bell and Judith Hibbard for their congeniality, advice, and help as editors of the Stanford University Press.

Finally, special thank must go to my wife, Teresa, and my daughters Roxanne and Lorraine, who have contributed substantially in many intangible ways to this project. Without their support and understanding, this project would not have seen the light of the day. This book is dedicated to my parents, whose sacrifice and unfailing love is the ultimate force that makes this book possible. While the sacrifice they made is hardly redeemed by the completion of this book, I hope we can all share the joy in seeing its final publication.
