

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book is a product of many inspiring encounters I had with people, ideas, and historical narratives over the past decade. My initial, unprocessed curiosity about vociferous discussions among modern Japanese intellectuals around population issues was nurtured and polished over time through formal and informal conversations with mentors, researchers, colleagues, students, and friends. The growth of this book project was not only temporal but also spatial. Repeated relocations and transitions across borders—more or less normalized in academia—have brought numerous opportunities to engage with different research communities with diverse approaches to historicizing the politics of population. First and foremost, I am deeply indebted to my academic mentors at Cornell University. Naoki Sakai, Katsuya Hirano, J. Victor Koschmann, and Suman Seth introduced me to critical approaches to the study of modernity, state and colonial governance, and knowledge production. Cornell also provided me with a space for intellectually stimulating interactions and discussions with scholars and peers: Chris Ahn, Ai Baba, Brett De Bary, Shiao-Yun Chen, Shoan Yin Cheung, Tyran Grillo, Jihyun Han, TJ Hinrichs, Sookyong Hong, Junliang Huang, Akiko Ishii, Marcie Middlebrooks, Rachel Prentice, and Kristin Roebuck.

This book would not have been possible without the help of research grants and fellowships. The Japan Foundation Dissertation Fellowship enabled me to conduct nearly one year of research under the mentorship of Ichirō Tomiyama at Doshisha University, Kyoto. The inclusive intellectual community I encountered at Doshisha generously and passionately supported my archival research, commented on my work, and taught me the importance of sharing ideas. I owe thanks to Yujin Jeong, Kazuki Nishikawa, Setsuko Kiriya, Asato Yoko, and Yea-Yl Yoon who provided encouragement and friendship. I also benefited from the expertise of Tomoko Tanaka and Akinori Odagiri in conducting in-depth research about Senji Yamamoto and the interwar birth control movement in Kansai region. In addition, the UCLA Terasaki Postdoctoral Fellowship in Japanese Studies offered me an invaluable opportunity to teach and communicate my work and to reorient my approach to the study of population discourse to engage with gender and race questions. I give my special thanks to Mariko Tamanoi, Junko Yamazaki, Wakako Suzuki, William Marotti, Kelly Midori McCormick, Sung Eun Kim, and Tomoko Bialock for their support of my postdoctoral research. Also, I cannot miss expressing thanks to the Centre for Asia-Pacific Initiatives at University of Victoria (UVic) for awarding me a visiting fellowship that allowed me to devote a substantial amount of time and energy to completing this book. Besides the above-mentioned fellowship opportunities, I was fortunate to be awarded a range of grants and awards, without which this book would have not come into existence: Japan Studies Travel Grant, Einaudi Center International Research Travel Grant, Dissertation Writing Group Grant, and Timothy Murray Graduate Travel Grant at Cornell University; Taniguchi Medal Award from the Asian Society for the History of Medicine; Graduate Student Best Paper Prize from the Northeast Asia Council of the Association of Asian Studies; and Internal Research and Creative Project Grant at UVic.

Parts of this book were presented in various forms at conferences and workshops, where I received invaluable comments and suggestions, and in journals, from which I enjoyed constructive conversations with numerous scholars. I am deeply grateful to John DiMoia, Alisa Freedman, Tatsushi Fujiwara, Susan Greenhalgh, Aya Homei, Christine Hong, Yu-Ling Huang, John Kim, Sonja M. Kim, Michael Shiyung Liu, Jin-kyung Park, Jennifer Robertson, Stefan Tanaka, and the late Aaron Stephen Moore. Despite the extraordinary challenges the pandemic has posed over the past years, I was able to build virtual support groups with researchers across the Pacific, to whom I am indebted for stimulating discussions and critical comments. Special thanks to Hirotaka Kasai, Sunho Ko, Seok-Won Lee, Margherita Long, Anne McKnight, Chizuko Naito, Young Sun Park, and Setsu Shigematsu. I especially express my gratitude to my colleagues at UVic for their tremendous support and encouragement: Angie Chau, Richard Fox, ann-elise lewallen, Cody Poulton, Victor V. Ramraj, and Lisa A. Surridge.

It goes without saying that I am truly blessed to work with the wonderful editor Dylan Kyung-lim White of Stanford University Press, who showed trust and confidence in my work throughout the whole process of publishing this book. The hard work of Sarah Rodriguez, David Zielonka, Emily Smith, and Jennifer Gordon, as well as Mary Mortensen, made the process extremely smooth for the neophyte author. I sincerely appreciate two anonymous reviewers for their insightful comments and suggestions. Parts of Chapter 1 appeared previously in “Technologies of the Population Problem: The Neo-Malthusian Birth Control Movement in Inter-war Japan,” Annual Review of Cultural Studies 5 (2017): 37–58, https://doi.org/10.32237/arcs.5.0_37; and parts of Chapter 2 were published as “Differing Conceptions of “Voluntary Motherhood”: Yamakawa Kikue’s Birth Strike and Ishimoto Shizue’s Eugenic Feminism,” U.S.–Japan Women’s Journal 52 (2017): 3–22, doi:10.1353/jwj.2017.0009. I thank both the Association of Cultural Typhoon and University of Hawaii Press for the permissions to reproduce them. Fuji shuppan generously gave permission to reproduce an image of the Pro-BC poster from their collected works.

The journey to this book would have not been possible without mentors, friends, and, most of all, family members who have motivated me along the way. I am thankful to my intellectual mentor at Yonsei University, Sung Mo Yim, for introducing me to critical Japanese studies. My parents have never stopped encouraging me to pursue my goals no matter how unconventional they may be. Finally, I dedicate this book to my husband, Samuel Sang-Hyun Ahn, who gave me loving and steadfast support during the ups and downs of the journey.

This page intentionally left blank