

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Writing this book has been a journey for me into little-charted waters. I am especially grateful to Stephen Slemon for boosting my morale through his unshakeable conviction that I had it in me to see my intellectual mission through. At a critical stage, he was unstinting in his assistance as a “pathfinder,” and has thus greatly helped in making this document the rewarding accomplishment that I feel it is.

I owe a debt of gratitude to a number of people who read and commented on the manuscript in various incarnations, and at various stages of completion. I have profited from their challenging queries, comments, and suggestions. I am greatly indebted in this regard to Ato Quayson, Biodun Jeyifo, and Ania Loomba. Suvir Kaul forced me to bring my abstractions down to earth by insisting that I should always historicize. Joseph Valente’s and William J. Maxwell’s critique of my original introduction resulted in what I hope is a stronger version.

My “research assistants” Kwadwo Osei-Nyame and Akosua Asabea Boakyee-Korang freely gave of their time (and money, in the case of Kwadwo), and combed the archives in London (Colingdale) and Cape Coast, respectively, to find me the material I needed for portions of this book. From Accra, Nana Akua Boakyee-Korang sent me photocopies of rare materials. I cannot thank my friend and my nieces enough for their invaluable contributions to this book.

My most ardent supporters, through thick and thin, have been and remain Zohreh Sullivan, Adlai Murdoch, Robert Dale Parker, and Philip Graham. I am lucky to have (had) on my side these wonderful human beings and to have received their encouragement. The list of my supporters and encouragers would of course be incomplete without mention of: Dennis Baron, Alma Gottlieb, Alice Deck, Janet Lyon, Michael Bérubé, Judy Murdoch, Yvette Smith, Shereen Mills, Stephanie Foote, Leon Chai, Joshua Esty, Julia Saville, Jean Allman, Nadine Dolby, Stephen David, Rebecca Starr, Michael Rothberg, Jamie McGowan, and Rene Wahlfeldt. Cary Nelson has been a pillar to lean on in a time of trouble: I can’t thank him enough. Jim Hurt and Lori Humphrey-Newcomb were sources of inspiration and assistance when it came time for me to write a book proposal. It is unfair to be selective this way when all I have known and come to expect is the unconditional love of my colleagues in the English Department, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. My heartfelt gratitude goes to the entire faculty of the Department for providing a wonderfully supportive environment for me. I am grateful also for the moral and spiritual support I received from afar—from Patience Sowa (Kansas City), Isaac Quist (Cardiff), and from my sister, Mrs. Henrietta Abban (Accra).

Let me mention in gratitude and appreciation Toyin Falola and Paul Zeleza for working extraordinarily hard to get my sizeable manuscript approved for publication by the University of Rochester Press. I appreciate, too, the contributions of Tim Madigan, the Editorial Director at Rochester, as I do those of my copyeditor, Louise Goldberg. I cannot end without thanking also the anonymous librarian(s) at the University of Nottingham who helped me to track down information on copyright holders for books long out of print.

This book is dedicated to my wife Gifty Ako-Adounvo, and to my sons Kwame Larbi-Korang and Victor Kwabena Larbi-Korang. Thank you for being my source of ultimate succor through difficult times; and for continuing to be a beacon of a hopeful future.

The fourth section of chapter 7 originally appeared as the third section of “Crisis and Accounting: Towards a Spatial History of the African Nation,” chapter 11 in Sacred Spaces and Public Quarrels: African Cultural and Economic Landscapes, edited by E. Kalipeni and P. T. Zeleza. I am grateful to the publisher, Africa World Press, for permission to reprint.

“Mutilated Congo,” by Bankole Awoonor-Renner, is reprinted by permission of Central Books Ltd., London.

The extract from “Gold Coast Customs,” by Edith Sitwell, is reprinted by permission of the author and the publisher, Macmillan.

I have not been able find any information on who the executors are of the estate of Dorothy Kurankyi-Taylor, in whose name, her publishers Stockwell have assured me, copyright for the poem “The Sensible Attitude” and the volume Reflected Thoughts in which it appears would have been lodged.

Kwaku Larbi Korang
Urbana, Illinois
July 2003