I can still hear the booming voice of the late Jeffrey P. Mass, who in his tough-love mentoring drove home the point, “Only you can fix your paper!” Upon completion, I indeed have to shoulder the burden of any and all errors or shortcomings; nevertheless, I am indebted to numerous friends, colleagues, mentors, and institutions.

I would like to thank my editor, Theodore Brown at the University of Rochester Press, for his early interest in my work and constant support throughout the writing process. James Bartholomew kindly read a semifinal draft, and this book benefits from his expertise concerning the history of science and medicine in Japan. William B. Hauser provided important advice concerning late-game editing. The feedback from Sarah Cypher at The Threepenny Editor was invaluable. The anonymous readers for the University of Rochester Press provided enlightening suggestions for reshaping the manuscript into a publishable piece. I also owe many thanks to Brett Walker for providing extensive feedback. My good friend and classmate from Stanford Brett Whalen read and commented on almost every chapter. Through his comments and continued involvement in my work, he has been a constant source of encouragement, exemplifying the academic spirit of camaraderie.

Suzuki Akihito acted as my faculty sponsor at Keiō University during a Japan Society for the Promotion of Science postdoctoral fellowship that supported research and writing throughout the 2008–9 academic year. I owe Suzuki-sensei and his assistant Iwamoto Chiemi many thanks for arranging travel funds and other logistical matters that made my sojourn truly productive. Ichikawa Tomō facilitated several visits to the Research Institute of Humanity and Nature in Kyoto under the auspices of Moji Kazuhiko for archival work as well as presentations of my scholarship. At Aoyama Gakuin, I presented research and received important feedback from the Asian Association for the Social History of Medicine, headed by Iijima Wataru. I continue to benefit from an ongoing research fellowship at the Kitasato Institute, sponsored by Kosoto Hiroshi, chair of the History of Medicine Department within the Kitasato University Oriental Medicine Research Center, which gives me access to the department’s library as well as the archives at the Shirogane Library. James Baxter, former editor of the Japan Review, helped me formulate an early iteration of this project, and I would like to acknowledge that the Japan Review has kindly allowed for the reproduction of material that appeared in Alexander R. Bay, “Beriberi, Military Medicine, and Medical Authority in Prewar Japan,” Japan Review 20 (2008): 107–59.

To my home institute of Chapman University, for the continued support from the chancellor, the dean of Wilkinson College of Humanities and Social Sciences, and the History Department chair, I owe many thanks. Nubar Hovsepien and Robert Slayton provided feedback on several occasions that helped clarify the main points of this study. Several faculty development grants, graciously awarded by the Chancellor's Office, funded summer trips to Japan for research. From my first day at Chapman, Carolyn Vieira-Martinez has been my comrade-in-arms in the struggle to integrate area studies into the history curriculum.

From my graduate student days at Stanford, I have many to thank. In the History Department, I had the opportunity to study with Peter Duus, professor of modern Japan. His keen intellect, sharp critical (red) pen, and above all, ability to take the convoluted argument of a graduate student and turn it into a clear and understandable sentence benefited me immensely. As a professional historian—both scholar and teacher—I hope that I can live up to the standards set by Professor Duus. Kären Wigen took me under her mentoring wing as I started the writing process and graciously offered me advice and much needed professionalization skills during my last years on the Farm. I am also thankful for the support and friendship of China historian Matthew Sommer. Within the larger academic community, I am indebted to Catherine Bae, Andrew Bernstein, Andrew Goble, Brian Goldsmith, Jeffrey Hanes, Itakura Kiyonobu, Quinn Javers, William Johnston, Kenji Hasegawa, Timothy Lenoir, Michael Lewis, Machi Senjūrō, Nagashima Takeshi, Greg Pflugfelder, Theodore Porter, Robert Proctor, Mark Ravina, Jessica Riskin, Ethan Segal, Rod Wilson, and Yamashita Seizō.

Over the years, I have been supported by fellowships from the Northeast Asia Council, the Stanford History Department, the Stanford Center for East Asian Studies, the Mellon Foundation, and the Freeman Spogli Institute for International Studies at Stanford. A Japan Foundation doctoral fellowship supported a year in Tokyo, where I was a research fellow at the History of Medicine Department within the Kitasato University Oriental Medicine Research Center.

A special thanks to my mom, Maryanne Bay, for providing the illustrations for chapter 6.

Lastly, although always my first priority, I received constant encouragement from my wife, Miki Bay. She has been an indefatigable partner through ten years of graduate school, four institutions of higher learning, two separate moves from the United States to Japan and back, and most importantly, the innumerable challenges of raising our two sons, Kagetazu and Maximus. This project could never have been completed without her support. To her goes my greatest thanks and love.
