

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Although the work of an anthropologist may seem quite solitary to many, I have long thought that my own work would not have been possible without the contributions of a wide network of people. While I am the author of this book, the voices of many others resound in this text.

My research in Slovakia was supported primarily by a US Department of Education Fulbright-Hays Fellowship and several Foreign Language and Area Studies (FLAS) fellowships through the US Department of Education's Title VI program. At the University of Michigan additional generous support came from a Václav Havel Award from the International Institute; several kind grants from the Department of Anthropology; and a Ronald and Eileen Weiser Award, administered by the Center for Russian and East European Studies. A return visit to Slovakia to share initial findings from my research was made possible with the assistance of the Havighurst Center for Russian and Post-Soviet Studies and funds from the Center for the Enhancement of Learning and Teaching at Miami University of Ohio. The bulk of the final version of the book emerged from a year of dedicated writing funded generously by the Harriman Institute for Russian, Eurasian, and Eastern European Studies at Columbia University in the City of New York. All these institutions supported my research, but I am solely responsible for the views expressed here.

Almost all of chapter 5 appeared previously as "Cosmologies of Criticism: Taste (Dis)trust, and Uses of Literature in a Slovak Classroom," Critique of Anthropology 29, no. 4 (2009): 1–23. Sections of chapters 2 and 3 were published as "Debating a Debate That Is No Debate? Censure, Publication, and the Contexts of a Moral Order in Slovakia's Velvet Revolution," Journal of Linguistic Anthropology 20, no. 1 (2010): 134–48. I am grateful to Sage Publications and the American Anthropological Association, respectively, for permission to reprint this material here.

Numerous teachers, mentors, colleagues, and friends contributed to this project in so many ways. Alaina Lemon, Katherine Verdery, Judith Irvine and Michael D. Kennedy have provided a kind blend of inspiring scholarship and steadfast support. I count myself very lucky to have worked with such people. The intellectual roots of this book originate at the University of Vermont, where I was fortunate to have been inspired, pushed, and mentored by Denise Youngblood, Doris Bergen, Patrick Hutton, Wolfgang Mieder, and David Scrase. At the University of Michigan I valued deeply the contributions of many faculty and staff at the Department of Anthropology and Center for Russian and East European Studies, particularly Bruce Mannheim, Zdenka Brodská, and Jindřich Toman. Several friends and colleagues have also commented over the years on proposals and drafts. They include Susan Frekko, Frank Cody, John Thiels, Deanna Poos, Dominic Boyer, Paul Manning, Martin Kanovský, Noah Sobe, Peter Bugge, Carol Skalnik Leff, Ed Snajdr, Charles Sabatos, James Mace Ward, Kevin Deegan-Krause, Susanne Unger, Karen Smid, Bridget Guarasci, Liviu Chelcea, Ed Murphy, Chandra Bhimull, Eric Stein, and Eva-Marie Dubuisson. Brad Abrams and Catherine Nepomnyashchy were a wonderful support during my time at the Harriman, which I found a collegial and productive place to work. Ronald Meyer, with the support of the Harriman Institute, has since been a generous mentor through the process of publication. Martina Podskanská and Paulina Bren provided helpful advice on permissions.

I would not have made it through the process of revising in such good cheer without the fellowship and support of particularly Kirsten Lodge, Tench Coxe, John Philip, Abby Jewkes, Bhavani Raman, Frank Cody, and members of the Department of Anthropology at the University of Michigan. More recently, John Hammond and Gemma Sala provided a home away from home in Iowa City, and John added technical assistance with the images in this book. The Department of Anthropology at the University of Iowa has served recently as a warm professional home, where I have appreciated encouragement or feedback, particularly from Laura Graham, Emily Wentzell, Ellen Lewin, Meena Khandelwal, Sonia Ryang, Nataša Ďurovičová, and John Durham Peters.

Many audiences at seminars and workshops have offered thoughtful remarks, including at the University of Iowa; the University of Michigan; the Harriman Institute at Columbia University; Miami University of Ohio; the University of Chicago; Princeton University; the Woodrow Wilson Center Junior Scholars' Training Seminar; Loyola University-Chicago; New York University; the University of Toronto; Oberlin College; the University of California at Berkeley; annual meetings of the American Anthropological Association and the American Association for the Advancement of Slavic Studies; and the Ethnological Institute of the Slovak Academy of Sciences. Suzanne Guiod and the staff at the University of Rochester Press have been extremely professional, patient, and pleasant to work with. I cannot imagine putting this book into print without the generous and thoughtful comments of the two reviewers that the Press solicited.

My friends and colleagues in Slovakia have enriched my life in countless ways. Colleagues from the Ethnological Institute of the Slovak Academy of Sciences (especially Gabriela Kiliánová, Zuzana Profantová, Juraj Podoba, and Dušan Ratica); Comenius University (especially Martin Kanovský and Marta Botíková); and the Linguistic Institute of the Slovak Academy of Sciences (especially Slavomír Ondrejovič) all made my research possible and exciting. Samuel Abrahám of the Bratislava International School of Liberal Arts has always been generous with his time and influenced this book very positively in several important ways. Nora Hložeková, Mária Paniaková, and Viera Zimová at the Fulbright Commission Slovakia are the perfect team and facilitated my research in every way. Numerous faculty, staff, and other professionals at institutions around Bratislava—especially AINová, Comenius University, and the Orava Project—were receptive and helpful in our conversations and in some cases in my observations of them at work. Martin Babčo and Bohuš Ochodnický assisted with transcriptions and securing some additional helpful materials.

I am fortunate to have a substantial Slovak “family” that is dear to my heart even if the frequency of our contact has decreased at the moment. In Martin, Anna Pišková and Marian Štefko have been unwavering in their welcome and support of the different roles I have played at their school. Yet without the cooperation and generosity of other colleagues in multiple departments whom I will leave nameless, this project might never have happened. I might never have come to feel as at home in Martin and now Bratislava as I do were it not for the embrace of the Vrabec and Holič families, with Tomáš and Andrea at the center. I am forever in their debt. The Hajtman family provided me with the perfect home base during my year of fieldwork and looked after me in kind ways. My first connection to Slovakia, however, was to the Krásna sisters and their families—particularly Oľga and her family—of Bratislava, Banská Bystrica, and Essex, Vermont. Little did Darina, Ladislav, and Ľuba know where this would all lead when we sat together in Darina and Ladislav’s living room in Essex in the summer of 1994. It has been my karma to find myself frequently in need of a home away from home, and Oľga, Vlado, Zuzka, Ivana, Dana, and Vlasto provided and have kept providing just that during my visits to Bratislava. I thank Marta, Michal, Katka, and Martina for their roles in this larger Slovak family of mine. So many of these relationships predated my research, but they have supported it in essential ways. In all, there are too many individuals in the Slovak and Czech Republic to thank who have engaged with me along the way, most of whom I keep anonymous, as I do throughout the book. Many conversations, interviews, observations, and experiences did not make it into the final manuscript, but that does not mean that they did not inform my thinking in crucial ways. I can only hope that the publication of this book also brings these friends, colleagues, and consultants a sense of reward and of invitation to continue our conversations.

On the subject of family, there are a few other final people I must thank. My parents, Robert and Karin Larson, have been patient, encouraging, generous, and inspiring in my intellectual and international endeavors. My life would not have taken the rewarding directions that it has without their love. My sister, Kimberly Larson-Edwards, has been a source of humor, creativity, curiosity, and belief in me for as long as I can remember. Finally, I am blessed to have had Deborah Michaels enter my life as I was preparing for this research. She has uniquely enriched my scholarship while adding so much joy, stimulation, and encouragement beyond it. I dedicate this book to her.