

Acknowledgments

This book is the product of research that began many years ago and benefited from stimulating comments by the organizers and participants at several conferences. Four were outstanding. Long before COVID-19 made Zooming ubiquitous, Diane Koenker and Anne Gorsuch organized a “virtual conference” for brainstorming among all the contributors to their pioneering collection of essays Turizm: The Russian and East European Tourist under Capitalism and Socialism (2006). Ron Suny and Olga Maiorova helped refine my thinking about tourism in relation to imperialism at the conference “Imperial Nation: Tsarist Russia and the Peoples of Empire” that they and their colleagues organized at the University of Michigan in 2011. Olga, again, and Deborah Martinsen spurred improvements in my treatment of Dostoevsky as travel writer at the conference held in 2013 at Columbia University in preparation for their co-edited volume of articles Dostoevsky in Context (2015). Finally, I thank Zaal Andronikashvili, Susanne Frank, and Giorgi Maisuradze for inviting me to speak on tourism at the meetings they organized on “Imperial Romanticism” in Tbilisi and Kazbegi in 2015, an unmatched opportunity to mix business with pleasure.

On that latter occasion, too, Emzar Jgerenaia, deputy director of the Georgian National Library, kindly supplied me with a copy of a rare mid-nineteenth-century Russian account of travel to Georgia. With respect to my sources, I also wish to express my gratitude to Timothy S. J. Phillips for having made available to me his excellent doctoral dissertation on the sociocultural history of nineteenth-century Russian resorts, a study prepared at Oxford University under the supervision of Catriona Kelly.

My most immediate debt is to Academic Studies Press and the referees of the manuscript. The series editor Michael Khodarkovsky began shepherding this book into print a couple of years ago. I thank him for his invaluable suggestions in conversations and in the course of reviewing successive drafts. I also benefited tremendously from Derek Offord’s meticulous review of the manuscript. Thanks to his labors, big ideas as well as fine points came into better focus. Working with the press has been delightful, from initial contact with the director Igor Nemirovsky to the weekly exchanges with Kate Yanduganova, the acquisitions editor for Slavic, East European, and Central Asian Studies. With patience and efficiency, Kate solved many problems that arose along the way. Thanks, too, to Stuart Allen and the other copyeditors for their painstaking work.

At a late stage in the preparation of this book, the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign provided me generous support as a participant in its Open Research Laboratory. My fellow Slavist John Randolph and the administrator James Fleener were much appreciated hosts. The vast knowledge and tireless assistance of the chief Slavic librarian Joe Lenkart allowed me to profit to the maximum from the rich collection. I am equally grateful to the research librarian Jan Adamczyk who has for many years facilitated my work by email. Most importantly, he set up the digital search engine that served me for locating all references to cosmopolitanism in the writings of the nineteenth-century critic Vissarion Belinsky. Among Joe's other colleagues, I give special thanks to Maeve Presnick who prepared the illustrations from the Russian magazine Niva and from books in the University of Illinois collection. I am grateful to the university for permission to reproduce those images here. Bella Irvine and Kevin Adams, other members of the library team, provided online assistance in the past and were ever ready to solve practical problems I encountered using materials in Urbana-Champaign.

Many thanks to the History and Literature Museum in Yalta for preparing and granting permission to publish the image of the postcard reproduction of Ilya Repin's painting of a Russian woman tourist with a Tatar guide in the Crimea. The Russian National Library courteously supplied the 1857 picture of Prince Mikhail Vorontsov's Alupka palace in the Crimea.

Bits and pieces of this book have appeared in the following articles: "Colonial Mimicry and Disenchantment in Alexander Druzhinin's 'A Russian Circassian' and Other Stories," Russian Review 60, no. 1 (January 2001): 56–71; "The Divisive Modern Russian Tourist Abroad: Representations of Self and Other in the Early Reform Era," Slavic Review 68, no. 4 (Winter 2009): 848–71; and "Our Travelers and the English: A Russian Topos from Karamzin to 1848," Slavic and East European Journal 56, no. 1 (2012): 1–20. An earlier version of my discussion of Lidia Veselitskaya's Mimi at the Spa, prepared for a 2010 anniversary conference on Tolstoy, is due to appear in Tolstoi: Art and Influence, edited by Joe Andrew and Robert Reid (Leiden: Brill, 2021). My thanks to one and all for permission to use the selected material in the present new framework.
