

Acknowledgments

We owe many friends, colleagues, and students a great deal for their help in bringing this project to completion. First of all, we appreciate the assistance of the Center for Academic Innovation at Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana, for their grants supporting various stages of this project. An initial grant from the center served as the impetus for our collaborative research on lottery politics, and a later grant supported our extension of this work into casino politics.

Erin O'Neill, Maria Vogel, Madeline Carpinelli, and Beth Urban assisted in data collection and research support. Celia Fallon provided invaluable, patient, and clever secretarial assistance in putting the manuscript together. Stephanie Artnak helped prepare the index. Professor Pierce's American Public Policy students served as guinea pigs in his attempt to elaborate and refine the model of policymaking presented in Chapter 3.

A number of valued colleagues have vastly enriched this book. Joe Stewart read various sections in earlier stages and offered consistently insightful criticism. His encouragement helped to keep us going. Dick Brisbin invited us to present a paper on a portion of this research and enabled us to discuss the ideas and arguments with Chris Mooney, Jeff Worsham, and others from West Virginia University. Chris continued to be a valuable resource for constructive criticism during the life of this project. We thoroughly enjoyed the discussions with members of the Political Science Department, and the manuscript benefited tremendously from their wisdom. Professor Pierce wishes to express his debt to Michael Hayes and Gerald Pomper for providing some of the initial theoretical ideas on which we based the book and, more importantly, for serving as models for how one ought to do political science and for the central role of theory. Other individuals who provided helpful criticism and advice include Ken Meier, Neal Beck, Fred Boehmke, and Rachel Pierce. Finally, our reviewers provided thorough, intelligent, and unsparing criticism of the manuscript. Of course, we reluctantly accept guilt for all remaining errors.

We would truly be remiss if we failed to acknowledge our debt to Leanne Anderson and Dan Eades of Lynne Rienner Publishers. Dan provided support and encouragement at the initial stages of the book project, and Leanne combined excellent judgment and lively wit to keep us going. And they both tolerated cheerfully our slower than expected completion of the manuscript. We could not ask for better editors. Our copyeditor Dorothy Brandt also deserves our appreciation for rescuing us from numerous awkward phrasings and mistakes.

Finally, we wish to thank our spouses, Aileen and Gail, for their patience and support throughout this project.
