THE GENESIS OF Celluloid Revolt: German Screen Cultures and the Long 1968 lies in the 2008 German Film Institute, which was co-organized by Anton Kaes and Eric Rentschler at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, and which focused on the German cinemas around 1968. We thank Tony and Rick for that summer's iteration, in particular, and for the invaluable service they provide to the field of German film studies by offering the German Film Institute.

We thank Jim Walker, our editor at Camden House, and Gerd Gemünden and Johannes von Moltke, series editors of German Screen Cultures, who understood the relevance of the book from the very outset. Their enthusiasm and support of the project as well as helpful suggestions along the way were much appreciated. We thank the two anonymous readers for their generous feedback, which helped to shape the volume.

We are grateful to the following persons at the press for their excellent work: Julia Cook, managing editor; Jacqueline Heinzelmänn, editorial assistant; Mark Baker, copyeditor; Jane Best, production editor; and Rosemary Shojai, marketing executive.

The book benefited from several conference panels devoted to the topic of 1968 and German cinemas at the 2014 Modern Languages Association convention and at the 2015 German Studies Association (GSA) conference, which Tina organized, as well as a 2013 GSA seminar, which Marco co-organized. The papers and audiences at these conferences confirmed our suspicion that there is much, much more to say about the long 1968 and German cinemas.

We are grateful to the College of Arts and Sciences at the University of Nebraska–Lincoln for supporting our project with an ENHANCE grant.

Our deepest gratitude goes to our contributors, whose work has shaped the book into something far beyond what we initially imagined. As Celluloid Revolt developed, we were fortunate to have the involvement and encouragement of colleagues, friends, and partners, and to witness the formation of new intellectual communities, some of which have already produced new collaborations. We look forward to the future conversations and projects generated by this volume.
