

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

From the writing of the first grant applications until the submission of the final manuscript, the project that led to the publication of this book took six years to complete (if projects can ever be truly completed – there are still so many loose ends to tie up!). That I was able to conduct this research is in large part due to the generous funding of the German Research Foundation (DFG), which financed my work from August 2018 to December 2022 under the heading ‘The Other Sagas. A New Reading of the “Post-Classical” Sagas of Icelanders’ (project number 400154111). I also benefitted from a Snorri Sturluson Fellowship, which allowed me to work at Stofnun Árna Magnússonar í Reykjavík in September 2021.

Just as important as the financial support that allowed me to read and write about late medieval Icelandic literature is the network of personal and professional ties without which I would never have been able to complete this book. I owe my biggest thanks to Stefanie Gropper, whose unwavering faith in my abilities and unfaltering support at all times gave me the confidence to continue, even when the obstacles seemed insurmountable. Thank you for everything. I also want to thank Sif Ríkhardsdóttir and especially Carlyne Larrington, the editors of this series, for their support and helpful comments along the way, and Caroline Palmer for being not only professional but also kind and accommodating when necessary.

Too many colleagues have supported and given me constructive feedback over the years to thank them all individually here, but two special individuals ought to be named: the amazing Anna Katharina Heiniger and Alexander Wilson, without whom I would have given up a long time ago, along with everyone else at the Tübingen Department of Scandinavian Studies. It truly takes a village or an entire department in this case. Many of my friends and colleagues – people who invested time and effort in discussing my work with me, helping me find secondary material, or offering new perspectives on the questions I was working on – are precariously employed or independent researchers. These circumstances force many fantastic scholars of our generation into leaving behind an academic milieu that offers no prospects, because it gets to a point where the precarity of our situation can no longer be borne. I hope, nevertheless, that some of us will be left to carry the torch.

This book could also not have been finished (and made to look good and read well) without the help of my student assistants Yvonne Meixner (who also compiled the manuscript database I mention at several points) and Hannah Kuhr, and especially my dear friend and proofreader extraordinaire Joanne Shortt Butler. Thank you for all your hard work! Any remaining errors and inconsistencies are, of course, my own.

Finally, to my friends Michi Bremauer, Lena Moser, Britta Kobus, Ulli and Robs 'Schäfermeister': thank you for putting up with me endlessly rambling on about sagas and university politics and academic precarity, and for making sure I get to think about other things regularly. To my father, Andreas Merkelbach, for never doubting me and fortifying me with good wine and coffee. And, above all, to Katharina Knopf, my love, who came into my life when I had finished writing two chapters and saw me through all the rest of it, never failing to love and support me. Words cannot express how grateful I am to have you in my life, and how much you mean to me.
