

Acknowledgments

Looking back from the end of my first decade of teaching, I can appreciate how lucky I have been to find excellent teachers at every stage of my training. Though neither is a teacher by trade, my parents have fostered my interest in the past for as long as I can remember. Ben Kohl and Karen Robertson introduced me to the joys of research and set me on the path to becoming a medievalist during my sophomore year of college. As a graduate student, I was fortunate to have the chance to study paleography with and serve as teaching assistant to the awe-inspiring Robert Raymo, and am sorry he did not live to see the publication of this book. The steady encouragement of Jill Claster, a former teacher who has become a dear friend, helped me over the hurdles of qualifying exams, dissertation defense, job-hunting, and pedagogical challenges. For the past decade my husband Michael has helped me translate Middle English, work through conceptual and technical problems, and always given in to my pleas of ‘just one more church’ on our travels.

Two mentors taught me to listen to the voices of the past with a sympathetic ear. Although this study did not begin as a dissertation, it is no less indebted to the mentorship of my graduate advisor, Penny Johnson, whose influence has strongly shaped my approach to scholarship and teaching. My decade-long friendship with the late Mary Martin McLaughlin, whom I first met while working on my undergraduate thesis on medieval nuns, meant more to me than I can say. Her well-loved books have kept me company throughout these past three years of writing, and I hope she would not mind my offering this book to her in return.

Many scholars served as sounding-boards and shared their expertise with me, often taking time away from their own research to do so. Scott Wells read the entire manuscript and offered invaluable suggestions for improvement. Conversations with Susan Wade helped me think through various aspects of monastic identity. I am grateful to the following colleagues who offered advice and encouragement and shared their unpublished work: Greta Austin, Karen Cheatham, Michael Curley, Denise Despres, Sandy Evans, Kriszta Kotsis, Matt Kuefler, Jennifer Thibodeaux, Tony Perron, Jane Tibbets Schulenburg, and David Tinsley. The anonymous reader for Boydell & Brewer offered detailed and insightful feedback. Any errors of fact or judgment that remain are entirely my own responsibility.

Finally, thanks are due to my colleagues and students at the University of Puget Sound, my academic home of the past five years. I count myself lucky to have supportive and congenial colleagues in the History Department and across the university, along with students who, to my delight, seem to take it for granted that the distant past is fascinating and worth studying. Humanities librarian Peggy Burge helped me navigate the Northwest Consortium, and the staff of the Collins Library Interlibrary Loan Office cheerfully tracked down many obscure titles. I also wish to thank the University for awarding me a Mellon Junior Sabbatical Fellowship, which, along with a grant from the Graves Foundation, allowed me to bring this project to completion.

An earlier version of the last subsection of Chapter 5 was previously published as 'Saints in Shining Armor: Martial Asceticism and Masculine Models of Sanctity, ca. 1050–1250' in Speculum: A Journal of Medieval Studies 83, no. 3 (July 2008): 572–602. I gratefully acknowledge the permission of the journal's editors to reprint this material.