

Acknowledgments

A book has many origins, but in this case it is important to acknowledge the role of Nancy Viviani, who first suggested the World Food Programme might be a good research project. At the University of Melbourne, Derek McDougall was unstinting in his support, and I must also thank Robyn Eckersley, who gave me crucial feedback and went beyond the call of duty to help me clarify my thinking about legitimacy.

Jim Ingram and Catherine Bertini were remarkably open and generous with their time and their knowledge.

The research I undertook would not have been possible without considerable assistance from the WFP—both as an organization and from individuals within it. The WFP gave me generous and open access to its workings as an observer to its Executive Board meeting in June 2005, along with a month at its Rome headquarters for interviewing and archival research. For assistance with my research at the WFP I owe particular thanks to Brian Gray, Allan Jury, Andreas Psoroulas, Sonnali Wickrama, Marianne Ward, Evelyn Togbe, and Anthony Beattie. Also in Rome, Nick Bredholt of Caritas International and Sylvie Mancini of Médecins Sans Frontières were very helpful. Joanne di Natale helped enormously with accommodations.

In Geneva, Katharina Samara, Ed Schenkenberg of the International Council of Volunteer Agencies, and Martin Loftus and Ioli Kimyaci at the UNHCR provided me with valuable assistance. In the United States, Lauren Landis, Margaret Zeigler, and Rick Leach were particularly generous with their time and advice. Simon Chesterman gave me valuable access to some of his extensive networks. In Australia, I am grateful to Alan Wilkinson and John Langmore for their help. Several AUSAID staff, who requested anonymity, were also of assistance.

As the book developed, the list of people I wish to thank for their help grew. Ray Hopkins and Jan Aart Scholte were generous with their feedback and encouragement, and acute with their comments. Thanks to Lynne Rienner for her interest and encouragement, and to Claire Vlcek for enthusiastic and professional assistance with the process of publication. Two anonymous reviewers also provided helpful feedback on the manuscript. A special thanks is due to my friend and colleague at the University of Melbourne Siobhan O'Sullivan, who provided useful comments for me on draft chapters.

My sister, Alison Ross, and brother-in-law, Amir Ahmadi, my father, Colin Ross, and his wife, Gay, all gave emotional and intellectual support—as well as helped with the more important things like child care—that make book writing possible.

Saving the most important for last, thanks are due to my partner, Cath Harmer, and our children, Alexandra and Joshua. They have borne with patience the occasional hint that this project might displace them from their centrality to my life.
