Chapter 1 Introduction and background.	1
1. An outline of the project.	1
2. An overview of the literature on cleft sentences	5
2.1. The expletive approach.	5
2.2. The extraposition approach.	7
3. A constructional approach to it -clefts.	9
4. A diachronic approach to it -clefts	12
5. Methodology.	14
Chapter 2 A model of language structure and language change.	16
1. Some basic assumptions.	16
2. A constructional model of language structure.	17
3. A constructional model of language change	21
4. The application to it -clefts and copular constructions	25
Chapter 3 Specificational copular constructions.	27
1. Different and competing analyses	27
1.1. The equative approach	28
1.2. The inverse approach	30
1.3. A less formal approach	32
2. Specification as (the inverse of) nominal predication	34
2.1. Specification and definite NP predicates	34
2.2. Specification and inversion.	38
2.3. Capturing this account in cognitive and constructional frameworks.	42
3. Accounting for the behaviour of indefinite NPs.	47
3.1. Specification and indefinite NP predicates.	48
3.2. An account based on discourse requirements.	49
3.3. An account based on definiteness.	51
4. Summarizing and extending the account.	56
4.1. An overview of specificational NP be NP sentences	56
4.2. Positioning this account in relation to the literature	58

4.3. Other specificational copular constructions	62
4.3.1. Th -clefts as specificational copular sentences. . .	63
4.3.2. Wh -clefts as specificational copular sentences. . .	64
4.3.3. All -clefts as specificational copular sentences. . .	68
4.3.4. A family of specificational copular sentences. . .	69
Chapter 4 It -clefts as specificational copular sentences.	71
1. The English it -cleft.	71
1.1. A “discontinuous constituent” account of it -clefts	72
1.2. Explaining the it -cleft’s pragmatic properties.	78
1.2.1. Focus	79
1.2.2. Presupposition	80
1.2.3. Exhaustiveness.	82
1.2.4. Contrast	85
1.3. Explaining the it -cleft’s structural properties	87
1.3.1. The behaviour of the cleft clause.	88
1.3.2. The evidence for VP constituency.	93
1.3.3. The evidence from agreement	96
1.4. Interim summary.	101
2. A comparison with expletive accounts of it -clefts.	102
3. A comparison with other extraposition accounts of it -clefts	107
3.1. The early extraposition accounts of the 1970s	107
3.2. The more recent discontinuous constituent accounts	110
3.3. A different extraposition account?	114
4. A comparison with other constructional accounts of it -clefts	115
Chapter 5 Other varieties of it -cleft	120
1. Beyond the archetypal it -cleft	120
2. Predicational (and proverbial) it -clefts.	122
2.1. An expletive approach to predicational it -clefts.	123
2.2. Predicational it -clefts and the inverse approach	127
2.3. Predicational it -clefts and the equative approach	131
3. It -clefts with non-nominal foci.	134
4. Informative-presupposition (IP) it -clefts	140
5. Summary.	146
Chapter 6 The it -cleft and earlier periods of English	148
1. Beyond the present-day language system.	148
2. The early history of the English it -cleft	149
3. A restrictively modified pronoun?	152

4. An obligatorily extraposed relative clause?	157
5. An unusual pattern of agreement?	162
6. The evidence from Old English gender agreement	170
7. The it -cleft as a relic from an earlier time	177
8. Summary	183
Chapter 7 The it -cleft's development over time.	184
1. A diachronic investigation	184
2. The corpora, the search and the selection process	184
2.1. OE presentational/impersonal sentences.	186
2.2. Existential sentences with it	190
2.3. The pattern I it am	191
2.4. Other constructions mistaken for clefts.	192
2.5. Interim summary.	193
3. Frequency information.	194
4. Changes to the clefted constituent	196
5. Changes to the cleft clause.	204
6. Summary.	211
Chapter 8 The it -cleft and constructional change.	212
1. The two kinds of constructional change.	212
2. A grammatical constructionalization account	213
3. Some alternative explanations	218
3.1. An impersonal account	219
3.2. A Celtic account	221
3.3. A word order account	222
3.4. Interim summary.	224
4. Why do it -clefts undergo a construction-specific development? . .	225
4.1. Why do it -clefts develop a construction-specific range of foci?	225
4.2. Why do it -clefts develop construction-specific discourse functions?	232
4.3. Summary.	241
Chapter 9 Conclusions	243
