Acknowledgements

The final reward of a finished dissertation is that one gets to write the acknowledgements. It is a chance to thank all the people that made the project possible and to focus on what the writing process really is – a communal process. Despite the popular image of the lone poet in the attic: in reality, it takes a village to write a book. The following are several of my fellow villagers:

First of all, I would like to thank Isabel Heinemann. This book would never have been possible without her guidance and encouragement. She is one of the few people that have mastered the art of productive criticism and trust in her team. The working environment she created was one where thoughts and ideas could truly flourish. My second doctoral advisor, Corinna Unger, provided invaluable advice on my writing process and generously shared her expertise whenever needed. I will remember her skill of asking questions never to prove a point, but to enhance my argument.

I am very much indebted to the Emmy-Noether-Programm of the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (DFG), which provided funding for the research undertaken in Germany and the US.

I am very grateful to the Max-Planck-Institut für Wissenschaftsgeschichte in Berlin, especially Christine von Oertzen, for giving me the chance to spend a couple of months in blissful seclusion in Dahlem with the library right at my doorstep and brilliant peers to discuss my ideas with.

I am truly thankful for Jürgen Overhoff's encouragement and guidance during the final phase of this project. I would like to especially thank him for reminding me of the beauty of writing and the value of research.

In addition, I would like to thank: Claudia Roesch for her stoic discipline and brilliant analytical skills, which she was always happy to share with the team; my always cheery colleagues Tim Zumhoff and Andreas Oberdorf whose enthusiasm for the academe and appreciation for the exchange of ideas I can only admire; Kerstin Wölki for reiterating time and time again that only a finished dissertation is a good dissertation; Anja Bassimir for last and first minute help whenever needed; Judith Mohrmann and Franziska Walter for their proofreading skills and academic enthusiasm; and Marko Müller for his ability to listen and structure my chaotic thoughts.

Finally, I would like to thank my uncle, Karl-Theo Thomaka, who has supported me throughout my entire academic career, and my parents, Hans und Elfie Overbeck, who taught me the love of books, stories, and histories at a very early age. Without their encouragement, patience, and love, my life and this book would not be the same.
