

Acknowledgements

A project such as this has many sources, and many have contributed to this one. We'd first like to thank our scholarly colleagues in the Center for Media, Religion, and Culture. The papers in this volume resulted from one of the Center's conferences, and the depth and significance of that event were due in no small measure to the efforts and reputation of the faculty, graduate fellows, and visiting fellows who continue to make the Center an exceptional place in global discourses on media and religion. The Center also depends on an exceptional staff, including during the course of this project Dona Olivier, Kimberly Donovan, Erin Ashbaugh, Claire Waugh, Valerie Albicker and Helen Gurnee. Finally, and in many ways most importantly, our efforts in research and scholarship would not be possible without the substantial support of the University of Colorado and its new College of Media, Communication, and Information, which came into being while this project was in process. The Dean of the college, Lori Bergen, Associate Dean for research Andrew Calabrese, and Media Studies Department Chair Rick Stevens continue to be important parts of what makes our work possible.

Finally, we want to thank those who contributed directly to this volume. First, the editorial staff at De Gruyter, in particular Alissa Jones Nelson and Sophie Wagenhofer, who have been patiently supportive throughout. We also benefitted from important assistance from Fellows in our center, and want particularly to acknowledge Dr. Ryan Bartlett, who provided invaluable editorial assistance and consultation at key moments in the process.
