

Acknowledgements

First of all, I would like to thank the people whose vision and industry have made the publication of this book possible: Rüdiger Campe and Paul Fleming for conceiving the series Paradigms and accepting my study for publication; the anonymous peer reviewers, who generously gave their time to critique and improve my work; and the editors at de Gruyter, Lydia White, Myrto Aspioti, Stella Diedrich and Florian Ruppenstein, who have adeptly and amiably helped me throughout the publication process.

This book began as the third chapter of my dissertation, Stories from Earth: Adalbert Stifter and the Poetics of Earth History, which I submitted to Princeton University in 2012. Although the book represents a major transformation of that work, I would like to acknowledge here the institutional support I received from the German Academic Exchange Service (DAAD), the Whiting Foundation, the Einstein Foundation, and Princeton University. This generous support made my research possible at a crucial stage in my career. I would also like to thank the members of the Princeton German Department for their teaching and mentorship, in particular Stanley Corngold, who guided me through my first years of graduate study; Juliane Vogel, who first encouraged me to read Adalbert Stifter; and Thomas Levin, who shared enthusiasm, critique, and professional support in equally generous measures. I also thank Devin Fore, who, along with Thomas Levin, provided timely and essential insights as a reader of my dissertation. I owe special thanks to my two dissertation advisors, Joseph Vogl and Nikolaus Wegmann, both of whom not only provided me essential impulses, encouragement, and excellent advice as I wrote the dissertation, but have also been tireless in their mentorship and support in the years since. The other people who made my time in graduate school such a memorable and rewarding experience are too numerous to name here. In addition to my friends at Princeton and in the PhD-Net: Das Wissen der Literatur at the Humboldt University in Berlin, I would like to thank Megan Ewing, Alana King, and Cornelius Reiber, friends who not only made Princeton an exciting place to be a graduate student, but who have consistently lifted me up in the tough times that accompany the writing of a dissertation and the search for employment as a humanities PhD.

At the Johannes Gutenberg University in Mainz, I have had the joy of working with a whole new group of friendly and supportive colleagues, and in particular, with Christopher Busch, Matthias Emrich, and Loreen Dalski, who have all enriched this book with their insights over the last five years. I would like to give special thanks to Ulrich Breuer, who has generously advised me as I brought this project to fruition. His exemplary mentorship, moreover, has made me confident that I will soon be able to thank him for his support of another text, my next book on melancholy and economics, which began as an article we co-authored for the Handbuch Literatur und Ökonomie (edited by Joseph Vogl and Burkhardt Wolf and published by De Gruyter in 2020). In addition to my coworkers in Mainz, a number of colleagues in Germany and the United States have provided invaluable support for my research in the form of lecture and conference invitations, including Anders Engberg-Pedersen, Christiane Frey, Michael Gamper, Arne Höcker, Frederic Ponten, Jana Schuster, Peter Schnyder, and Nathan Taylor.

I have saved the acknowledgments of my greatest debts for last: to my sister, Cara, who, as I write this, is risking her health during a pandemic to bring new lives safely into the world, but who has always found the right words of encouragement for her brother, who, on his best days, brings a new phrase onto the page; to my parents, John and Jane, who have themselves, in the midst of this crisis, turned their attention to the correction of this manuscript. Their editing help is only the tip of the iceberg – to explore its vast extent would require at least another book – but it suggests the gift they have provided their children: whenever I turn to them, they respond to the best of their ability, which includes a great capacity for love. Finally, I thank my wife Justine, who has graciously conversed with me about Stifter, Viollet-le-Duc, and geology since we first met. She also read the complete manuscript before I submitted it for review, and improved it immensely. More importantly, she helped convince me that, despite the flaws that remain and are my own, my desire to publish this study was not misplaced.
