

Acknowledgments

This book is a revised version of my doctoral dissertation, which I completed at Harvard University Divinity School and defended in the Spring of 2018. I would like to thank the editors of Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft for accepting this book into their fine monograph series, as well as the editorial staff at Walter de Gruyter, especially Alice Meroz and Sabina Dabrowski, for their kind assistance and meticulous work throughout the publication process. I acknowledge that an earlier draft of Chapter 2 of this manuscript was published in the Catholic Biblical Quarterly (83 [2021]: 425–45) under the title, “Entering the Kingdom of Heaven Not like the Sons of Earthly Kings (Matthew 17:24–18:5).” I am grateful to CBQ general editor, Leslie Hoppe, for his kind support.

When I embarked on this journey through ancient childhood, I had little knowledge of where it would lead me over the next ten years. Living far from my homeland while writing about how early Christians thought of children led me to experience temporal, cultural, and linguistic border crossings, which often both challenged me and brought unexpected wonders. Many people have accompanied me and witnessed my joys and struggles on this long, arduous path as my research has been reborn into this book.

My deepest gratitude goes to Laura Nasrallah, my dissertation advisor and longtime mentor, for the countless hours she has spent patiently and thoroughly reading so many different iterations of my work; her caring words, practical wisdom, and genuine encouragement have always come right as I’ve needed them most. Both her academic rigor and selfless mentorship have been so exemplary that I will always strive to emulate them as a scholar and a teacher.

I would also like to extend my sincere thanks to Karen King for her insightful comments on this research. I learned so much from her expertise in the Coptic language and comparative study of religion, and her encouragement during the final writing stage of my dissertation meant a great deal to me. Giovanni Bazzana’s incisive feedback was crucial for my analysis of the Gospel of Matthew, and I am grateful for his warm support and professional advice throughout my doctoral study. Thank you to Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza for raising thought-provoking questions about my theoretical framework for this project. Her democratic, feminist pedagogy will continue to inspire my teaching. I would also like to acknowledge two late professors at Harvard, François Bovon and Helmut Koester, whose scholarship opened my eyes to a variety of ancient materials that I had not previously known. Additionally, I am grateful to Michael D. Jackson for his anthropological insights, which helped me to evaluate ancient texts through a fresh lens, and Stephanie Paulsell, who has shown me that mentoring students and writing can be forms of ministry.

The collegial and supportive atmosphere of the New Testament and Early Christianity program at Harvard offered continual motivation for salvaging my dissertation writing from the abyss of time. My thanks go especially to Margaret Butterfield, Jung Hyun Choi, Greg Given, Sarah Griffis, Chris Hoklotubbe, Roberto Mata, Lydia Bremer-McCollum, Karen Connor McGugan, Heather McLetchie-Leader, Kelsi Morrison-Atkins, Chan Sok Park, Sarah Porter, Jennifer Quigley, and Tyler Schwaller for providing thoughtful feedback on rough drafts of my manuscript and for creating such a wonderful academic community. Friendship, as well as practical and spiritual support, both within and beyond my Harvard circle also sustained me while I was conducting my research; for this, I am especially grateful to Eleanor Craig, Ashleen Menchaca-Bagnulo, Eunhee Nah, Erin Northington, Young Ra Rhee, and Ann Bartels Tackett, inter alios. I would also like to thank my faculty colleagues and students at the Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago for their eagerness to read this book. I am especially looking forward to sharing the joy of publishing my first book with Barbara Rossing, Esther Menn, and Klaus-Peter Adam.

Finally, words are not enough to express my enormous gratitude to my family. My father, Yongsoon Lim, and my mother, Sangran Yoo, never gave up on me (Mark 5:21–42; Matthew 15:21–28) and their unceasing prayers, deep faith, and unstinting love are the reasons why I am who I am. Special thanks go to my siblings, extended family, and mentors in Korea, especially Yongseok Chung, Taeyeon Cho, and Jinsoon Song, who have long cheered me on from afar. Above all, my gratitude goes to James Lee, who has been a brilliant and caring conversation partner, and who studied, suffered, and rejoiced with me (Romans 12:15) through each challenging and wondrous year of this project. I deeply appreciate his bringing so much joy to my life and being a loving father to Ethan and Sophia, who were born at the alpha and the omega stages of this book, respectively.
