The book began as a doctoral dissertation. It would not have come to fruition without help from many hands. First and foremost, I must express my thanks to my family, particularly my wife, Wuyao Liu. Without their understanding and support, this book would not have been started and completed.

I am extremely grateful to my supervisors at University of Edinburgh – Dr. Felix Boecking and Dr., now Professor, Jeremy Crang – for their excellent and cooperative supervision. The thesis has benefited significantly from their expertise and professionalism in their respective fields of Chinese and British history. This has encouraged me to seek to balance my discussion between Chinese and British perspectives. Dr. Crang has also offered me enormous help and advice in relation to the thesis structure and my written English.

I also owe a debt of gratitude to the Collaborative Innovation Centre for Territorial Sovereignty and Maritime Rights at Wuhan University, and to the Chinese Scholarship Council. These institutions funded my doctoral studies at Edinburgh and allowed me to focus my time and energy on this research. My gratitude also extends to Professor Dekun Hu at Wuhan University who seven years ago re-ignited my passion for study abroad. The initial idea for this book topic is derived from him.

This thesis incorporates significant archival research. I am indebted to the Simon Fennell Award, and to Research Student Support Fund, in the School of History, Classics and Archaeology at Edinburgh which helped finance my two visits to London to work in the National Archives and the British Library. Further thanks are due to Dr. Xuelei Huang in the School of Literatures, Languages and Cultures at Edinburgh, and to Professor Li Zhang at the Institute of Modern History, Academia Sinica, Taipei. They helped to facilitate my research trip to Taipei, for which I am very grateful.

I want to express thanks to Dr. Francesca Kaufman, now on the academic staff at University of Manchester, who proofread most of my original drafts and provided valuable suggestions and criticisms. My thanks also extend to two examiners of my PhD dissertation, Professor Alvin Jackson at University of Edinburgh and Dr. Tehyun Ma at University of Sheffield, and two anonymous reviewers of my book manuscript. Their comments and revision suggestions are valuable to this book.

Last but not least, I want to express my gratitude to book editors of De Gruyter Publishers, Rabea Rittgerodt, Jana Fritsche and Antonia Mittelbach. Thanks for their hard work and support; without them the book would not be published in such a high-quality fashion.
