

Acknowledgments

Like every research project, this book is a collaboration that would not have been possible without the help, support, encouragement and patience of a lot of people – some of whom we would like to mention and thank here specifically.

The idea for this book arose from a panel that we organized at a conference of the International Pragmatics Association, which took place online while the world was battling with the global COVID-19 pandemic. Many of the chapters included in this book benefited from the discussions we had during the conference and afterwards with authors and other interested colleagues – academic and professional. We would like to thank everyone who came to our panel and who participated in our discussions and helped shape our thoughts and ideas long after the conference.

As our ideas formed and the chapters were written we have benefited immensely from ongoing conversations with Amanda Coulston (England Boxing), Stuart Cain (Warwickshire Country Cricket Club) and Alan Rapley (UK Coaching), who have not only agreed to co-author some of the chapters in this book, but who also generously shared their time in talking to us about the important inclusion work they do every day when interacting with athletes, fans, and other stakeholders.

A very big thank you also to Natalie Fecher at Mouton de Gruyter for approaching us after the conference and inviting us to bring together our ideas and discussions in the form of an edited volume; and for providing constant support and believing in the book throughout the process. And to the Department of Applied Linguistics at Warwick University for its financial support towards the creation of this book.

And last but not least, we are very grateful to Yesim Kakalic for fearlessly and endlessly formatting the various parts of this book and putting in extra hours so that we would meet our deadline. All remaining infelicities are, of course, entirely our own.
