

Acknowledgements

It has taken several years for this volume to come to fruition, and the editors want to thank first and foremost the contributors. We are grateful for their patience, their unwavering commitment to this project, and, most importantly, their willingness to engage in an interdisciplinary dialogue with each other about documents in the ancient world, guided by the modern theoretical concept of documentality. This project stems from a conference held in 2016 at the France-Stanford Center for Interdisciplinary Studies, and we are grateful to the Center for the generous Collaborative Research Grant that they awarded us to organize the conference. We also thank Grant Parker at the Classics Department at Stanford University, who has supported this project from the start. We owe a great debt to Hester Higton, who did a wonderful job copy-editing the manuscript. The anonymous reader for De Gruyter provided many fruitful insights, which improved this manuscript in important ways. We thank the editors of the Trends in Classics Supplementary Volumes series, Franco Montanari and Antonios Rengakos, for their help in seeing the publication of this volume through to the end, as well as the team at De Gruyter Classical Studies. The three of us first met at the Advanced Seminar in the Humanities at Venice International University, where the idea for a project on documents and documentality was born. We want to thank, in particular, its conveners Ettore Cingano and Lucio Milano, without whom this project would not exist.
