

Acknowledgements

This project has been very long in the making. I wish to thank for Fellowship support the Guggenheim Foundation, the Katz Center at the University of Pennsylvania, the Tikvah Foundation at New York University Law School, the Littauer Foundation, the Hartman Institute in Jerusalem. I have benefited immeasurably from ongoing discussions across many years with many people, but wish especially to thank Suzanne Stone. A note on the term “sacred” in what follows: Levinas’s use of the terms “sacred” is not always consistent, especially in translation, as is also the case with the term “holy.” Sometimes he intends the “sacred” or the “holy” as the effort to unite with transcendence, overcoming its distance.

Sometimes it represents the awe of transcendence as absolute distinction. This latter sense of “sacred” reflects the Hebrew term kedushah, as sanctity or sacrality that marks this awe, which is how it is used here.

With gratitude and in memory of my teachers Sacvan Bercovitch, Harold Bloom, Geoffrey Hartman. In Memory of my Mother and Father.

