

Acknowledgements

I cannot begin to tell you how many people had a hand in shaping this book, but I will try.

First and foremost, my spouse, Matt Roberts, supported this work through his active listening and by chauffeuring our children's school drop-offs and pick-ups while I was in my writing frenzies. He also watched ninety-five percent of the television programming that is referenced in this book with me. He specifically asked me not to finish the dramady Younger without him when he heard its telltale theme music late one evening while he was working from home during the aftermath of the time-warp that was COVID-19. Matt, you are the love of my life—and this book would not have happened without you.

Second, my colleagues in the communication discipline have not only shaped the person and scholar I am, but shaped this book through their insight. I am specifically indebted to the Rhetoric Society of America for their mid-career writing workshop, through which this work was supported by Kristen Hoerl's, Alice Johnston Myatt's, and Letizia Guglielmo's steadying enthusiasm and accountability. There is nothing in academia like women who write together.

Likewise, then, this book is indebted to my weekly writing partner, Lauren Slone, and to LJ's Coffee Shop in Holland, Michigan—where a significant portion of this book was drafted.

Within my own Communication Department at Hope College, this book owes a debt of gratitude to Marissa Doshi's incisive commentary about—and struggle against—the way women are increasingly referred to as “females.” This expert “hot take” has influenced my writing, helping guard against the creep of femme-phobic language.

Similarly, I am grateful to Jim Herrick who led the Hope College Communication Department for so long and who was instrumental in recruiting me to this department. Jim has recently passed. As I grieve his loss, I am grateful for his influence on my scholarship. Jim was an exemplary rhetorician and my work is better for him.

Institutionally, the Women's & Gender Studies Program at Hope College is simply the best and supported this research through a summer grant that paid for the research assistantship of Hope undergraduate Joanna Thornburg. Ms. Thornburg is a real delight and her work is layered throughout this book. I'm so glad we got to work and learn together! The Provost's Office at Hope College also provided support for this book through a Nyenhuis Faculty Development Grant. I am incredibly grateful for the tangible ways in which Hope College has supported this book project.

My sister (Claire Kornfield), friends (Kristin Mathe Coletta and Devon Schalcher Torchiana), parents (Bill and Jennie Kornfield), and sons (Jacob and Geoffrey Roberts) have all supported this writing with their enthusiasm, recommendations, and kindness. I love you all.

Finally, my sincere gratitude to the editors and staff at De Gruyter Press, who acquired this book, developed its cover, reviewed it, copy-edited it, typeset it, and produced it. Without you, there would be no book. Thank you.