This book owes its existence to the generous funding provided by the Leibniz Junior Research Group ‘Religion, Morality and Boko in West Africa: Students Training for a Good Life’ (Remoboko), based at Leibniz-Zentrum Moderner Orient (ZMO) in Berlin, Germany. I am deeply grateful to Abdoulaye Sounaye, the head of the project, for his support and trust throughout this endeavour. The manuscript has been substantially enriched by the insightful discussions and advice from other members of the Remoboko team: Vincent Favier, Bello Adamou Mahamadou, and Adéjoké Rafiat Adétorò. I could not have wished for a more supportive and intellectually stimulating team with whom to collaborate and learn from their respective case studies.

My colleagues at ZMO, particularly those in the Contested Religion and Intellectual Culture Unit, have provided invaluable feedback on several chapters, for which I am immensely thankful. I also extend my gratitude to the external reviewers, whose constructive criticism has significantly enhanced the quality of this work. I am grateful to Svenja Becherer for managing the review process, formatting the text for publication, and providing ongoing support throughout the project. I would also like to thank Andy Tarrant for his meticulous editing of the manuscript.

The heart of this research lies in the fieldwork conducted in Benin and Togo. This book would not have materialised without the indispensable contributions of my interviewees, both current and former activists and students from the University of Lomé and the University of Abomey-Calavi. While I cannot mention everyone, I would like to express my special appreciation to Alain Gnansounou, Yaya Assadou Kolani, Michel Oni Djagnikpo, Hake Chabi Assa, Aziz Gountante, Armand Dzadu, and Sabin Sonhaye. I am particularly indebted to Farid Bah-Traoré for his invaluable assistance during my research stays in Lomé, and to Fiacre Anato for his support in Cotonou and Abomey-Calavi. These research trips not only contributed to this book but have also forged lasting friendships.

My time at the University of Florida (UF) Center for African Studies as a Banting Postdoctoral Fellow in 2018–20 has significantly influenced this work. I am thankful to colleagues there, specifically Leonardo A. Villalón, Benjamin Soares, and Terje Østebø. The research I conducted on Muslim minorities in southern cities of Benin and Togo, along with numerous discussions with colleagues at UF, significantly informed this book project.

Finally, and most importantly, I owe an immeasurable debt of gratitude to my wife, Andrée-Ann. Her unwavering support during my extended research stays away from home, her patience through the many challenges of academic life, and her willingness to make sacrifices over the years have been the bedrock upon which this work stands. This book is as much a testament to her endurance and support as it is to my research.
