

Acknowledgments

Many people contributed in making this book, and I owe a great deal to all those who have supported me as I developed the ideas that appear in the following pages. To begin, I extend my deepest gratitude to Thomas Hughes, who has faithfully read and provided incredibly thoughtful feedback on all the material included in these chapters. Much of the work for this project originally began with my first Spring Term course in 2017 at Washington and Lee University. I am indebted to the wonderful conversations with students in this seminar, from whom I learned much about how the Mahābhārata, and Bhagavad-Gītā within it, could be approached from a political perspective. Here I offer special thanks to my student research assistants at Washington and Lee University over the past eight years that have helped me further articulate some of the ideas and arguments that appear in this book, especially the research contributions made by Davis Alliger, Bryce Zaremby, Gareth Minson, and Sydney Lee.

Thanks also go to Arindam Chakrabarti, Vrinda Dalmiya, Farah Godrej, Prerita Govil, Burke Hendrix, Murad Idris, Jesse Knutson, Sankaran Krishna, Quinn Lester, Joshua Simon, and Anna Stirr, each of whom provided insightful feedback during the development of the project and challenged me to think carefully about various parts of my argument. As ever, I am incredibly lucky to have had a supporting family and friends over the years, who have provided the much-needed reassurance that I could in fact see this project through to the end. Most of all, I thank Sierra for her love, understanding, and unwavering support. Without her this book would not have been possible.

I would also like to thank those who provided thoughtful comments at professional conferences over the years, including numerous panels at the Midwest and Western Political Science Association Annual Meetings, as well as a thematic conference on federations and (anti)imperial thought at Columbia University in 2018. I must extend extra gratitude to the Center for South Asian Studies at the University of Hawai'i, Mānoa, which graciously welcomed me as an affiliate scholar during my sabbatical in winter/spring of 2023. It has been a tremendous pleasure to work with Ze'ev Sudry at De Gruyter Press, who showed initial interest in the project. His support and professionalism have been invaluable in bringing this book to completion. I am grateful for Michaela Göbels' thoughtful assistance during the publication process and helping bring the book to the finish line, and to Elizabeth Nichols for her astute copyediting. Relatedly, I value and appreciate the thoughtful feedback of the anonymous reviewers, whose critiques and suggestions pushed me to sharpen the ideas and arguments presented in the book.

Research for this book was carried out on campuses and libraries at Washington and Lee University, Harvard University, and the University of Hawai'i at Mānoa. Ongoing support from my academic community at Washington and Lee has helped make this book possible. Specifically, this project has been funded by Lenfest Summer Research Grants and a Sabbatical Fellowship from Washington and Lee University. I would also like to highlight the tremendous support from Robert D. Straughan, the Crawford Family Dean of the Williams School and Professor of Business Administration at Washington and Lee, who graciously extended financial resources to help make the online open access of this book possible. Additional support for the publication of this book was provided by the Class of 1956 Provost's Development Endowment at Washington and Lee University.
