When I went to Paris in 1967 with a romantic desire to study linguistics I had never heard of Noam Chomsky. I have Noam Chomsky and destiny to thank for the fact that when I grew weary of French structuralism there was the Chomskyan approach to the study of language that immediately stimulated me and has never ceased to give me immense intellectual satisfaction. Destiny didn't manifest itself in the form of Syntactic Structures and Aspects alone, it was helped along a great deal by my first teachers of transformational grammar: Oswald Ducrot, Joe Emonds, Maurice Gross, Richie Kayne, Yuki Kuroda, Jacques Mehler, and Nicolas Ruwet, as well as by my fellow students, especially Hans Obenauer.

The Linguistics Department of the University of Amsterdam, where I went after Paris, provided me with very pleasant surroundings and a lively atmosphere in which I have at all times found it a pleasure to work. I have always had a love-hate relationship with the extreme heterogeneity of the approaches to linguistics represented in the department. The ensuing eclecticism often irritates me, but at the same time I have to recognize that this is both a main source of the great intellectual and personal freedom that I enjoy in the department and a constant challenge. I am grateful to all my friends in the department who make it a nice place to be in.

My fascination with the syntax of prepositional phrases can easily be traced back to Ray Jackendoff, in particular to his paper on PPs and his classes in Amherst in the summer of 1974. My early work on PPs took place in the context of a research project on Dutch grammar. I gratefully acknowledge the financial support of the Netherlands Organization for the Advancement of Pure Scientific Research (grant 30-15), the stimulating discussions I had with Alied Blom, Saskia Daalder, Peter Nieuwenhuijsen, and, in particular, Frans Zwarts who were with me on the project, and my debt to Simon Dik who made it all possible.

Simon Dik it is also who deserves credit for having been a friendly, stimulating, thorough, and astute supervisor of this thesis. I greatly appreciate his shrewd and patient advice and his efforts to make me clarify what I was trying to convey. Many thanks I also owe to my two advisors Ivonne Bordelois and Wim Klooster. Noam Chomsky, Joe Emonds, and Jan Koster also carefully read a first draft and offered valuable comments. Connie Menting did a beautiful job in preparing the manuscript.

Many friends have in one way or another contributed to this thesis. I cannot mention them all, but would like to single out Hans Bennis, Hans den Besten, Anneke Groos, Riny Huybregts, Jan Koster, Pieter Muysken, and Norval Smith.

It would be foolish to deny that MIT and the people in and close to it still in many ways constitute a kind of Mekka for me that I just love to pilgrim to every once in a while, not in the last place because of the great intellectual and personal hospitality that the "pilgrim fathers" (and mothers) - Noam Chomsky, Bob Freidin, Ken Hale, Morris Halle, Mary-Louise Kean, Jay Keyser, Joan Maling, Edwin Williams, and many others - always extend to me.

I owe a great deal also to Lyle Jenkins, Richie Kayne, Jean-Yves Pollock, Luigi Rizzi, Alain Rouveret, Nicolas Ruwet, and Jean-Roger Vergnaud for helping to make it a lot of fun to be a Generative Linguist in the Old World. A special word of thanks goes to Alain and Agnès Rouveret for offering me the use of their marvellous apartment in Rome in the summer of 1977 where several chapters of this thesis were written.

I owe a deep gratitude to four great friends and confrères who, each in his own way, have had a profound influence on my life and my thinking: Joe Emonds, Jan Koster, Jean-Roger Vergnaud, and Edwin Williams.

I am in great debt also to my parents who made it possible for me to dash off to Paris and to indulge in this esoteric enterprise called linguistics. I have benefited a great deal by their liberal encouragement.

Last but not most I want to thank Doris. Her good-humoured, uncomplicated friendship has been a constant source of support. It is to a large extent her tolerant companionship that has made the strain of getting the whole thing written up quite bearable.
