

List of contributors

Ludovica Banfi is a programme manager at the European Union Fundamental Rights Agency (FRA) based in Vienna, where she deals with issues of migration and discrimination. After earning a PhD in sociology at the University of Trento in Italy, she worked as research fellow at the University of Bologna and later joined the Social Policy Research Centre at Middlesex University in the UK to participate in different European framework projects on migration and discrimination.

Paolo Boccagni is a lecturer in sociology at the University of Trento in Italy, whose main areas of work are migration studies, social policy and sociological theory. His recent research analyses patterns of immigrant integration and transnationalism among Latin American migrants in Europe through a combination of different methods, including policy analysis, surveys and ethnographical and biographical analysis.

Paola Bonizzoni is a research fellow in the Department of Social and Political Sciences at the University of Milan in Italy. She is interested in migration studies, with a focus on gender relationships and family ties. Her PhD dissertation, from which her chapter in this volume is drawn, explores family reunification and transnational family life among Latin American immigrants in Milan. She is currently involved in a comparative research project about female migration in Italy.

Christine Catarino is an associate member of the Institut des Sciences sociales du Politique at the Université Paris Ouest Nanterre La Défense in France. Her areas of investigation and publication cover migration as well as class, gender and ethnic relations.

Gillian Creese is director of the Centre for Women's and Gender Studies and a professor in the Department of Sociology at the University of British Columbia in Canada. Her research interests include women and trade unions, immigration and settlement issues in Canada and feminist research methods. Her current work addresses gendered and racialised processes of immigrant settlement in Canada, with a particular focus on immigrants and refugees from sub-Saharan Africa.

Helga de Valk is a professor of migration, families and the life course in the Department for Social Research at the Vrije Universiteit Brussel in Belgium and senior researcher at the Netherlands Interdisciplinary Demographic Institute (NIDI) in The Hague. Her research focuses on the transition to adulthood of immigrant youth, educational inequality, union and family formation, the second generation and intergenerational relationships in immigrant families.

Isabel Dyck is a professor of human geography in the Department of Geography at Queen Mary, University of London in the UK. Her research centres on issues of gender, identity and the body in the constitution of everyday life, with a particular interest in immigrant settlement experiences. A recent focus has been on the local-global interconnections that are seen when analysing the remaking of home and health in particular places.

Venetia Evergeti is a senior research fellow at the Centre for Research on Nationalism, Ethnicity and Multiculturalism (CRONEM) at the University of Surrey in the UK. Her research focuses on interactionist sociology and the ethnographic study of ethnicity and identity. She has explored identification processes among indigenous Muslim minorities and migrants in Greece and the interplay between ethnicity and transnational family care networks in relation to the Greek diaspora in the UK.

Núria Empez Vidal is a social educator, currently completing her PhD in social and cultural anthropology at the Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona in Spain, where she also serves as an associate professor in the pedagogy department. Her dissertation is about unaccompanied minors from Morocco in Catalonia. She is a member of the DRARI Collective of Participative Investigation for the Rights of the Child and a member of the Working Group on Childhood & Migration.

Annett Fleischer obtained her PhD in social and cultural anthropology at the Freie Universität Berlin and at the Max Planck Institute for Demographic Research in Rostock, Germany. She also holds a Master's degree in social and cultural anthropology, communication, and theatre and film from the Freie Universität Berlin. Her specialisations are transnational migration and immigration policy, kinship, family formation and reproductive behavior, mainly in sub-Saharan Africa and Europe.

Amparo Gonzáles-Ferrer is a permanent researcher at the Spanish Research Council and an associated professor of sociology at the University Pompeu Fabra in Barcelona, Spain. She has conducted research in the fields of international migration and family dynamics and the political integration of migrants in their receiving societies. She coordinates the Spanish country study in the Migrations between Africa and Europe project known as MAFE.

Ralph Grillo is an emeritus professor of social anthropology at the University of Sussex in the UK, where he was formerly dean of the School of African and Asian Studies and director of the Centre for Culture, Development and Environment. He has researched migration in Africa and Europe and written extensively on multiculturalism in France, Italy and the UK.

Eleonore Kofman is a professor of gender, migration and citizenship and co-director of the Social Policy Research Centre at Middlesex University in the UK. Her research focuses on gender, migration and citizenship – especially relating to family and skilled migrations – stratification and global migrations, feminist political geographies, cosmopolitanism and immigration and national identities.

Martin Kohli is a professor of sociology in the Department of Social and Political Sciences at the European University Institute in Florence, Italy. He is director of the research group on aging and the life course at the Freie Universität Berlin. He has published extensively on the sociology of the life course, generations and aging, family, labour markets and social policy and the emergence of a European society.

Albert Kraler is a researcher at the International Centre for Migration Policy Development (ICMPD) and a lecturer at the University of Vienna in Austria. His recent research has examined family migration policies in selected European countries, policies towards irregular migration in the EU member states, discrimination and different aspects of migration statistics.

Arlene Tiger McLaren is a professor emerita in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology at Simon Fraser University in Canada. As a feminist sociologist, she has examined issues of education, family, immigration and migration and is currently working on automobility and traffic safety.

Laura Oso is a senior lecturer in the Faculty of Sociology at the University of A Coruña in Spain. Her research work has focused mainly on gender and migration and the immigrant population's insertion into the labour market, with particular interest in domestic service, prostitution and ethnic entrepreneurship.

Yvonne Riaño is a senior lecturer in the Institute of Geography at the University of Bern in Switzerland. She received her PhD in geography from the University of Ottawa. She has carried out extensive research in Latin American and European cities on issues of migration and gender. Her research interests are in social inequality, labour market participation, self-organisation, citizenship and participatory research.

Louise Ryan is a reader in migration and gender and co-director of the Social Policy Research Centre at Middlesex University in the UK. Her research interests include gender, migration, ethnicity, religion and identity, social networks and social movements and transnational families. Her current research is on Polish migrants in London.

Djamila Schans is a postdoctoral researcher in the Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences at Maastricht University in the Netherlands. Her research focuses on the intersection of family studies and migration studies with a special focus on transnational family ties.

Panitee Suksomboon recently completed her PhD at the Leiden Institute for Area Studies (LIAS) at Leiden University in the Netherlands. She is a lecturer in the Faculty of Sociology and Anthropology at Thammasat University in Bangkok, Thailand. Her research focuses on marriage migration and families of Thai migrant women in the Netherlands.

Camille Schmoll is an assistant professor in human geography at the Paris Diderot University in France. Her research focuses on transnational migration, local economic development, gender and second-generation immigrants in the Euro-Mediterranean area.

Aurélie Varrel is a researcher, at the Centre d'Études de l'Inde et de l'Asie du Sud (CEIAS) at the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique (CNRS) in Paris, France. Her current research focuses on highly skilled migration, gender issues and skills, new patterns of circulation, transnational life spaces, dual citizenship issues, remittances and urbanisation in countries of origin. She takes a particular interest in India and Indian migrants.

Sarah van Walsum is senior researcher in migration law at the VU University, Amsterdam in the Netherlands. She has published widely on transnational family relations, family migration law and women and immigration law, including the book The family and the nation: Dutch family migration policies in the context of changing family norms (Cambridge Scholars Publishing 2008). Her present research is on the position of migrant domestic workers in the Netherlands.

