

Acknowledgments

Over the years of work on this project, I have benefited greatly from the support of numerous friends, colleagues, mentors, and editors. Without their generous attention and kind encouragement, this book would not exist. It goes without saying that any infelicities and mistakes that appear in its pages are entirely my own responsibility.

I was fortunate to learn from Esperanza Ramirez-Christensen, Ken K. Ito, Jonathan Zwicker, and Kevin Carr, as well as Keiko Yokota-Carter and Celeste Brusati at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, who each generously offered insights and expertise as I developed the ideas that have informed this work. I am deeply grateful to Judith N. Rabinovitch of the University of Montana, without whose infectious appreciation for the language and images of early Japanese and Chinese poetry I would never have embarked on this path.

During my research in Japan, I received support and generous guidance from Professors Ogawa Takeo and Sasaki Takahiro at Keio University, Unno Keisuke at the National Institute of Japanese Literature, and Higuchi Yuriko at Nara Women's University. I would not have been able to complete the research and fieldwork required for this book without assistance from the Japan Foundation, New York. Many thanks go to my University of Iowa (UI) colleagues Kendall Heitzman and Morten Schlütter and to everyone at UI International Programs, whose unstinting enthusiasm and energy made the Japan Foundation Institutional Support Grant available to our community of scholars.

I have had the pleasure of meeting many friends and mentors through collaborations, workshops, and conferences. I am especially grateful to those who patiently read and listened to multiple versions of various chapters of this book at meetings of the Midwest Japan Seminar and the Waka Workshop. In addition to the Obermann Center for Advanced Studies Fellows grant, I benefited enormously from the community of scholarship fostered by Teresa Mangum and many others I encountered there.

I am deeply grateful to my intrepid sisters from all manner of writing groups, both online and in person, including those I met through the UI Early Career Faculty Academy, the Obermann Faculty Working Groups, NCFDD Faculty Success Program, and the tenacious Penguin Huddle, who all offered the perfect balance of steadfast accountability and heartfelt friendship, precisely when each was needed.

Finally, I extend my love and gratitude to my friends and family: Linda and Darrell Strand, for your love; Carol and Glenn Junkert, for your sincere interest and endless curiosity; and Greg and Owen Strand, for always cheering me on, especially when I most needed it. Thank you.
