The original research for this book was undertaken in 1964 and 1965 on a grant from the Foreign Area Fellowship Program. I am grateful to my dissertation advisers at Harvard, Professors Rupert Emerson and Martin Kilson, for their encouragement throughout the course of this work; to Dr. David Arnott of the School of Oriental and African Studies (University of London) for assisting in preliminary Hausa language studies in 1963; to the Emir of Kano and his Council for permission to live, with my family, inside the walled city of Kano from June 1964 to September 1965. I was able to return to Kano for six months in 1970 on a Fulbright-Hays grant. I am indebted to the Program of African Studies at Northwestern University for support in the typing, and retyping, of this manuscript.

Within Nigeria, more people helped me than I can begin to mention. At Abdullahi Bayero College (Kano), the Provost, Shehu Galadanci, has been gracious in every way, and many of the staff members have read draft portions of this manuscript and have offered comments and corrections: John Lavers, Muhammad al-Hajj, Dandatti Abdulkadir, Ibrahim Mukoshy. At Ahmadu Bello University (Zaria), Professors Abdullahi Smith and James O'Connell have encouraged my studies of northern culture. Dr. Murray Last read the entire draft manuscript closely and from the beginning has been a friend and inspiration in this work. Similarly, Professor Ernest Gellner encouraged me by his interest in this study from our first meeting in Kaduna, and portions of the manuscript have reached him on three continents. These sections without fail have benefited from his mature judgment and keen eye for detail.

I could not have undertaken the initial field research in Kano without the cooperation of student scholars, many of whom are currently working in institutions of higher learning: Umaru Faruk Ladan, Muhammad Mijinyawa, Isa Kurawa, Muhummad Uba Adamu, Ahmad Getso, Mahmud Tukur, Ibrahim Yaro Yabaya, Abdurrahman Adam, and others. Many in Kano have opened their doors and have gone out of their way to make this study possible: Husaini Sufi, Ahmadu Trader, Aminu Kano, Ado Bayero, Maitama Sule, Alfa Wali, Dahiru Wali, Mudi Salga.

I am especially indebted to those friends and colleagues who have read major portions of this manuscript at various stages of preparation: John Chamberlin, Brad Martin, Haroun Adamu, and Abdullahi Mohammed. Colleagues at Northwestern University have also encouraged this study and contributed their ideas, especially Professors Ronald Cohen and Ivor Wilks. Ann Paden has worked with me on all phases of this book from the field research to the index. She is more a part of this effort at cross-cultural understanding than she will realize or acknowledge.

I would particularly like to express my gratitude to those mallams, situated in the area from Senegal to Nigeria, who have shared their time and interest in discussing the substantive issues in this book: Limamin Kano Dalhatu; Wazirin Kano Abubakar Dokaji; Babban Mallami, Ibrahim; Limanin Yola; matar Wali Suleiman, Saudata; Muhammad Dan Amu; Nasiru Kabara; Ahmad b. Ali; Tijjani b. Usman; Shehu Maihula; Sharif Ahmad; Abubakar Atiku; Faruk Salga; Sa'id Hayatu; Abba Sa'id; Garba Sa'id; Sayid Nuru Tall (Senegal); Ibrahim Niass (Senegal); Aliyu Sisi (Senegal); Muhammad al-Hadi (Mauritania); Tijjani b. Ibrahim (Senegal); Mawla'i Idris (Fez); Modibo Kari (Adamawa); Umaru (Zinder); Muhammad dan Maradi (Maradi); Babban Makaranta (Kumasi); Ibrahim Diop (Senegal); Babba Diasse (Senegal); Wazirin Sokoto, Junaidu; Sultan of Sokoto, Abubakar; Muhammad Sidi; Husaini Adamu; Abubakar el-Nafety; Mudi Sipikin; Na'ibi Wali; the staff members of the School for Arabic Studies, Kano; the staff of Shahuci Judicial School, Kano; the staff of the Arabic Teacher Training College, Sokoto; representatives from each of the traditional mosques in Kano; Na'iya (Zaria); Muhammad Ghali (Hadejia). I am grateful to the staff of the Nigerian Archives, Kaduna (NAK), for their help, I would like to thank, too, Kabiru, Abu, Bashiru, Umaru, Abba, and Nuhu.

An author must reserve in the end a special measure of gratitude for the gift of a talented secretary. Mrs. Anne Potter has typed several versions of this book with skill and humor.

As a personal note, I would like to record for all those who have asked our son, Audu, where he got his nickname that it was given him by our neighbors in Kano. Amy, his sister, was born after we left Kano, but we call her Amina because that is the name these friends would have chosen for her.

The problems of cross-cultural research, especially participant observation, will be clear in reading this book. Any errors of judgment or fact are entirely my own responsibility. I have drawn heavily on primary written sources wherever possible, and have included many excerpts in this book, not only to illustrate the style of Kano culture, but as a corroboration of more personal interpretations based on oral data and observations. In Kano, the line between public knowledge and private knowledge is often not well defined, and I have tried not to violate the confidence of those with whom I have worked. I have dedicated this book to the mallams of Kano, who have allowed me to record a part of their history. I have also dedicated this book to their sons, who will help to shape the destiny of modern Africa partly by the way in which they evaluate the legacy of their fathers.
