

Acknowledgments

This book is the product of years of support, collaboration, and encouragement (which I often resisted) from friends, family, and colleagues, among many other guiding lights—and its publication is as much their achievement as it is mine. I begin by thanking those who funded or mentored the research on which this book is based. Thank you to my colleagues at the Microsoft Research New England Social Media Collective for my wonderful internship in 2017 and for kindly hosting me again in 2019. I am grateful to Nancy Baym, Tarleton Gillespie, Mary L. Gray, Dan Greene, Sharif Mowlabocus, and Dylan Mulvin for your close mentorship over the years and for encouraging me to wait a little while longer to write the book I really wanted to write instead of more speedily getting out the one I thought I should. Thank you to the British Academy for selecting me as a Small Grant recipient in 2018, and thank you to the Department of Sociological Studies at the University of Sheffield for awarding me with Strategic Research Support funding in 2022. I also thank the University of Sheffield’s Faculty of Social Sciences for funding a secondment to the 5Rights Foundation in 2022 and am grateful to their fantastic Policy team—particularly Izzy and Daral—for their guidance.

I also wish to thank the audience members, reviewers, and kind question-askers at the various conferences and events at which I have presented elements of this book over the years, particularly the Association of Internet Researchers (AoIR), the European Communication Research and Education Association (ECREA), the International Communication Association (ICA), Ofcom, along with many others. I thank you for your interest in the work I have been doing and for encouraging me to keep going with this book in the face of obstacles, including the Covid-19 pandemic and suspension of my fieldwork and my yearslong struggle to figure out its throughline. I am so lucky to have colleagues and friends in my field who have guided me through the years, who have either read drafts of this book, reviewed the manuscript and/or the proposal, or have been involved in formative conversations. To Crystal Abidin, Phoenix Andrews, Anna Bailie, Maitrayee Basu, Sophie Bishop, Robyn Caplan, Niki Cheong, Ranjana Das, Tom Divon, Harry Dyer, Anna Gibson, Debbie Ging, Zoë Glatt, Briony Hannell, Tim Highfield, Tama Leaver, Kate Miltner, Tzlil Sharon, Nic Suzor, Katrin Tiidenberg, Jacqueline Ryan Vickery, and my anonymous reviewers: thank you so much for your support and kindness. Tremendous thanks go to my collaborators, whose efforts fundamentally shaped this book and the research on which it is based: Tarleton Gillespie, Anthony McCosker, and Helen Thornham.

When I started my job at the University of Sheffield in 2017, I didn't know where my place would be. I was a non-sociologist embedded within a department of sociological studies, supporting the growth of two brand-new degree programs and given more responsibility than I knew what to do with. But people took me, nearly fresh out of my PhD, under their wings and guided me through my journey in a way I'm still not entirely sure I deserve.

My colleagues are all wonderful, and I feel lucky to work among such genuine kindness and collegiality. But special mention must go to Katherine Davies, Hannah Ditchfield, Kate Dommett, Helen Kennedy, Nathan Hughes, Sarah Neal, Kitty Nichols, and Mark Taylor for their endless patience and wisdom. I also thank my lovely friends for the adventures, laughs, and voice notes that have made everything around my work and this book feel so special: Anita, Bryony, Fobazi, Geoff, Jordan, Katie/Blossom, Meg/Gab/Birdie, Nat, and Victoria. And to Jez: a wonderful friend whose time with us was far, far too short. I also thank my lovely extended families—the Kidds and the Walshes—who have welcomed me with open arms and championed every part of my career since the day we met. To my adventure-loving dad and Milla, who taught me that life is far too short and needs to be lived, preferably in a sunny place and with your next flight booked, and to my wonderful mum and Jonathan, for always giving me a place to rest my head and pour out my soul.

As many of my readers will know, I have never written a book before, and so I feel incredibly lucky that my first experience was steered by Michelle Lipinski. Michelle, you have been the best editor I could've wished for (and made me the source of such envy among my peers!). You have been so patient, kind, and excited about this project, even through the Covid delays and other strange life occurrences, and I thank you wholeheartedly for everything you have done. Crucially, I also thank my research participants, whose words and experiences have made this book a reality. I thank them for trusting me with their stories and letting me into their lives and for giving me hours of joy as they taught me everything I needed to know about social media today. I also thank the educators and facilitators I've worked with over the last few years for introducing me to their students, and for having faith in me to handle the work with ethical care.

I close this section by thanking two people (and some animals) of equal importance, without whom I could not exist on a day-to-day basis let alone write an entire book. To James Lowell Walsh and our four-legged family—Buttercup and Hazel, the kittycats; Willow, the puppy dog; and Billy, the pony (otherwise known as my “serotonin machine”)—thank you for teaching me that falling in love is not just something that people in movies do and for always encouraging and enabling me to get this finished. To Elena Rosa Maris, thank you for our cross-continental coworking sessions, which are the highlights of my week and go a long way in bridging an approximately 4,000-mile physical distance. Thank you for making me laugh until my sides hurt, thank you for supporting me without question (even when you really, really should question it), and thank you for being the best friend anyone could ever have.
