The path we travel on the journey to social justice is long and the way is hard. But the people we meet along the way—those whom we accompany and who accompany us—make it all worthwhile. I have been fortunate to speak with, work with, and learn from a wide array of readers and interlocutors as I developed this book, and I wish to express my deep gratitude to them here.

Early drafts of the book were shaped by conversations with Tricia Rose, Sarah Rios, Anna Chatillon, Raphaëlle Rabanes, Jordan Camp, Christina Heatherton, Johari Jabir, Lundy Braun, Nan Enstad, Annie Hikido, Jasmine Kelekay, Danielle Purifoy, Ingrid Waldron, Lawrence Brown, Louise Seamster, Andrew W. Kahrl, John Robinson III, and Shanna Smith. Sections of individual chapters benefited greatly the advice of Elizabeth Korver-Glenn, Juana María Rodríguez, and Bernadette Atuahene. Representatives of activist groups whose work is described in the book from East Los Angeles, Halifax, New Orleans, Grand Rapids, Oakland, and San Diego vetted those sections for accuracy. Discussions with Omar G. Ramirez helped me begin to comprehend the generative possibilities of restorative cultural arts practice/praxis. Part of my readiness to learn from these mobilizations originated in my previous work with Asian Immigrant Women Advocates in Oakland, Project Row Houses in Houston, and Students at the Center in New Orleans.

As I confront the danger zones that are everywhere I treasure the accompaniment of freedom-loving friends, allies, and teachers. These include representatives of the Black resistance tradition of New Orleans: Kalamu ya Salaam, Sunni Patterson, Jerome Morgan, Shana M. griffin, Jim Randels, Ashley Jones, Dave Cash, Robert Jones, and Daniel Rideau; the activists of East L.A.—Martha Gonzalez, Quetzal Flores, Juana Mena Ochoa, Amy Kitchener, and Betty Marin; and activist engaged scholars Diane Fujino, Jesus Hernandez, Daniel HoSang, Lorgia Garcia-Peña, John-Carlos Perea, Jessica Perea, Walter Johnson, Rachel Buff, Celeste-Marie Bernier, and Jonathan Gomez.

Through my work as board chair of the African American Policy Forum I have had the honor of working with Kimberlé Crenshaw and Luke Harris as they honed and refined the theory and practice of intersectionality and critical race theory. Parts of chapter 5 in this book originated in the article “In an Avalanche Every Snowflake Pleads Not Guilty: The Collateral Consequences of Mass Incarceration and Impediments to Women’s Fair Housing Rights,” which appeared in volume 59, number 6 of the UCLA Law Review in August 2012 and was based on my presentation at a symposium on women, race, and criminalization that Crenshaw organized.

I have great respect, admiration, and gratitude for the fighters for fair housing that I have encountered over the years, whose activism informs and inspires the arguments in this book. Amy Nelson and Caroline Peattie offered valuable feedback on the sections in this book on litigation relating to appraisal discrimination. The book’s broader arguments about fair housing owe an enormous debt to Mary Scott Knoll, who introduced me to the struggle and to her colleagues Sharon Kinlaw and Michelle White. Service on the board of directors of the National Fair Housing Alliance gave me the privilege and pleasure of learning from and working with Shanna Smith, Lisa Rice, Jim McCarthy, Vince Curry, John Petruszak, Keenya Robertson, Wayne Dawson, Lila Hackett, Anne Houghtaling, Erin Kemple, and Nancy Haynes. The attention I devote in chapter 1 of this book to the particular injuries that children experience from housing discrimination originated in my work with my friend and colleague Vince Larkins on a fair housing case that revolved around those injuries. Opportunities to attend and present research at fair housing laws and litigations conferences have enabled me to savor and draw from the profound wisdom of Michael Seng, F. Willis Caruso, Chris Brancart, Chancela Al-Mansour, Nadine Cohen, and many others. Being a co-presenter with Scott Chang at many of those meetings gave me opportunities to learn from and be inspired by his profound understanding of both the limits and the possibilities of the law.

I am deeply grateful to UC Press executive editor Niels Hooper for our many years of work together and for his support of this book. Anonymous reviewers of the manuscript provided valuable comments and criticisms of its ideas and arguments, while the sharp eyes and astute critical judgment of copyeditor Elisabeth Magnus greatly enhanced the clarity and precision of the final version. I thank my artist friends, mentors, and interlocutors Omar G. Ramirez and Shana M. griffin for allowing me to use their creative works to illustrate my arguments.

Everything I think, say, write, and do is informed and inspired by the presence in my life of Barbara Tomlinson. I treasure her intelligence, integrity, character, and courage, and thank her for all that has been made possible by her accompaniment.
