ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

It is humbling, at the conclusion of a project so often solitary, to reflect on how much its successful completion owes to individuals and institutions without whose encouragement, advice, financial support, and cooperation this book could not have been written.

Research for this book and for the dissertation on which it is partially based was supported by a number of generous grants. These included a Châteaubriand Scholarship from the French government, a Dean's Dissertation Fellowship from the Department of History at New York University, a Summer Research Grant from NYU's Remarque Institute (made possible by the generosity of the Mellon Foundation), a Summer Research Stipend from the National Endowment for the Humanities, and three grants from Ball State University: a new Faculty Summer Research Grant, a Supplemental Equipment and Travel Grant, and a Faculty Summer Research Grant.

The staffs of the following institutions deployed equal parts patience and perseverance in helping me to track down the primary sources on which this book is based: the Bibliothèque Nationale (Salle des Imprimés and Salle des Périodiques); the Bibliothèque de France; the INAthèque; the Paris police archives; the municipal archives of Longwy-Bas, Sens, Rennes, Strasbourg, and Caen; and the departmental archives of Meurthe-et-Moselle, Meuse, Ille-et-Vilaine, and Calvados. Many thanks also to the interlibrary loan staff at Ball State University for their tireless efforts on my behalf.

I am indebted to Serge Laget for his willingness to share his unrivaled knowledge about the Tour, for providing me with access to a copy of the unpublished report L'Auto produced about its wartime activities, and for setting up interviews with the late Jacques Goddet, the former editor in chief of L'Équipe, and Victor Cosson, a former Tour racer. John Hoberman, one of the most thought-provoking historians of sport, also has been a great resource. I thank him for reading chapter 6 and for sharing his insights on the history of doping in sports.

Three people were kind enough to grant me interviews that enhanced my understanding of important aspects of the Tour's history. M. Goddet graciously answered all my questions about the race's history going back to the 1930s. M. Cosson, who finished third in 1938, arrived at the offices of L'Équipe on his bicycle and regaled me with stories about racing in the 1930s and 1940s. Finally, Helen Hoban could not have been more forthcoming in discussing her experience as a Tour racer's wife, including the tragic death during the 1967 Tour of her first husband, the English racer Tom Simpson. I can never repay her willingness to speak openly about such private matters.

I have benefited from the advice, suggestions, criticisms, and guidance of scholars on both sides of the Atlantic. In Paris, Jacques Revel enthusiastically supported this project from the beginning. Georges Vigarello guided my preliminary research on the Tour's history, and Patrick Fridenson lent me a rare primary source and suggested I look at a master's thesis, both of which proved most helpful. Pascal Ory and Steven Kaplan invited me to present my research at the Université de Versailles Saint-Quentin-en-Yvelines and Cornell University, respectively. I am also grateful to the American Historical Association, the Society for French Historical Studies, the Western Society for French History, and the International Society for the History of Physical Education and Sport for giving me the chance to present papers at their annual conferences. These were all invaluable opportunities to test my arguments and benefit from the insights of the scholars in attendance.

I could not have hoped for a more stimulating environment in which to pursue a doctorate in modern French history than the one I found at New York University. Three professors, in particular, played pivotal roles. The late Nicholas Wahl, the first director of the Institute of French Studies, supported me unstintingly from my arrival at the institute. My two principal dissertation advisers could not have been more helpful. I am grateful for Professor Tony Judt's attention to detail, his unfailing accessibility (on whichever side of the Atlantic he happened to find himself), and his rapid reactions to drafts of my dissertation chapters. Professor Molly Nolan's doctoral seminar on modern Germany introduced me to the kinds of historical problems I continue to find most stimulating, and her insights into the organizational and conceptual challenges of my dissertation made me a more thoughtful and more careful historian. Meanwhile, my classmates were always ready to listen to my musings about the Tour and offer their suggestions. I am especially grateful to John Savage, who encouraged me to explore the extent to which my dissertation topic intersected with several important themes in the history of the Third Republic. I also greatly benefited from the insights of two friends who preceded me at the Institute of French Studies: Janet Horne patiently helped me work through one of the key arguments of this study, and Shanny Peer assisted me in thinking more rigorously about social class.

My colleagues in the History Department at Ball State University also made important contributions. René Marion and Carolyn Malone commented on early drafts of two chapters, and Rob Hall put his encyclopedic understanding of the historiography of European class identities at my disposal. I am grateful for his patience in helping me work through certain thorny—at least to me—conceptual issues. I owe a special debt of gratitude to Jim Connolly, whose eye for argument, impatience with unnecessary evidence, and gift for organization were of great benefit as I confronted large amounts of data and looked for the best way to tell an often complicated story. He read the entire manuscript and made suggestions that improved the flow and the argument of two chapters in particular. I am fortunate indeed to count such intelligent and congenial historians among my friends.

The University of California Press was from the beginning enthusiastically supportive. I thank the two historians who read the manuscript for the press for their encouraging assessments and helpful suggestions. At the press, Sheila Levine offered timely advice and exhibited much-appreciated patience throughout what must at times have seemed an interminable process. I thank her for understanding that this book would take time to write. More recently, Niels Hooper, Rachel Lockman, Laura Harger, and Erika Büky have shepherded the manuscript through the production process. I am grateful for their determination to make the finished product as good as possible, and for their skill and professionalism in doing so.

I thank my family for their support throughout the researching and writing of both my dissertation and this book, especially my father, who read the entire dissertation and suggested stylistic changes that improved my prose. Perhaps even more important than their encouragement, generosity, and hospitality, three generations of Thompsons continually offered me timely reminders that there may in fact be more to life than cycling. I look forward to testing that hypothesis with them in the years to come.

Finally, I wish to recognize the special contributions of my friend Myra Van Hus. In addition to putting me in touch with Helen Hoban, over the past thirty years Myra has always been there for me, through the good times—of which there have been so many—and the difficult moments, which she inevitably finds a way to ease. I will never be able to thank her enough for her humor, her enthusiasm for the good things in life, and her courage and selflessness in confronting its challenges.
