

Acknowledgments and Dedication

The Power of the Zoot would never have been if not for the generosity, support, and assistance of many people. I would like to thank, first and foremost, everyone who took the time to share with me their personal histories and recollections of the early 1940s. These former zoot suiters and their families provided the inspiration for this project. I am particularly grateful in this regard to my great uncle, Antonio Alvarez. He not only introduced me to the zoot when I first interviewed him for an undergraduate research paper many years ago, but always showed me it was possible to live with style and dignity. I dedicate this book to him.

Certain of the interviewees preferred not to have their names used. I have chosen to respect their wishes by referring to them with pseudonyms.

During my time as a graduate student at the University of Texas at Austin (UT), as a faculty member in the history departments of the University of Houston (UH) and the University of California, San Diego (UCSD), and in my travels between these institutions, this project benefited from the many friends and colleagues who shared their time, constructive criticism, and ideas on how to make it better. I thank them all. At UT, I learned a great deal from David Montejano, Toyin Falola, Neil Foley, Ted Gordon, Jose Limon, Gunther Peck, and my fellow graduate students, especially those in the Advanced Seminar in Postcolonial Borderlands and the Advanced Seminar in Chicana/o Research. At UH, Raul Ramos, Monica Perales, and Joe Glatthaar helped make the adjustment to my first job much easier, and it was a joy to work with John Hart, Sue Kellogg, Marty Melosi, Tatcho Mindiola, Steve Mintz, Joe Pratt, Lupe San Miguel, Landon Storrs, and the graduate students in my Chicana/o and ethnic studies seminars. Also at UH, Jimmy Patino provided valuable research assistance. At UCSD, I have been warmly welcomed into a rich and engaging intellectual community by each of my new colleagues in the history department and by many others across campus. In this regard, and in many cases, for their deep engagement with my work, I am particularly thankful to Jody Blanco, Fatima El-Tayeb, Yen Le Espiritu, Tak Fujitani, David Gutiérrez, Ramón Gutiérrez, Sara Johnson, Lisa Lowe, Curtis Marez, Natalia Molina, Nayan Shah, Shelley Streeby, Danny Widener, and Lisa Yoneyama. As it developed, this project also benefited greatly from my discussions and interchanges with Steve Azcona, Manuel Callahan, Ed Escobar, Judith Halberstam, Lisa Lowe, Vicki Ruiz, Sonia Saldivar Hull, Maggie Rivas-Rodriguez, George Sánchez, Chela Sandoval, Paul Spickard, Zaragosa Vargas, Victor Viesca, and Diego Vigil. I am especially grateful to Ed Escobar and Diego Vigil for generously sharing their expertise in pertinent archives and for identifying interviewees, respectively. Two other individuals, David Gutierrez and George Lipsitz, have my utmost appreciation for their unflagging support of and engagement with this work since its inception.

At the University of California Press, Niels Hooper was a wonderful editor from beginning to end, and I thank him for helping make this a better book. Ed Escobar and Vicki Ruiz provided the sort of incisive, thoughtful, and extensive reviews of the manuscript that every author should be so fortunate to have.

My family not only supported me from the beginning of this project but eagerly discussed it, attended conference presentations, read different parts of the book as it developed, and provided comfort and home-cooked meals along the research trail. I would not have enjoyed working on this book nearly as much as I did if not for the time it enabled me to spend with Sylvia Alvarez, Corey and Lankford Jackson, Vanessa and Chris Wright, and Denna and Sadys Espitia. My parents, Robert and Karen, and my sister, Amalia, are always there for me in any way I might ever ask and, at the same time, ask the hard questions that make me think about why my work is important. Marilyn Espitia lived with this project from its earliest stages as a dissertation proposal, sat through so many hours of practice job talks and conference presentations that she could have delivered the presentations herself, and, no matter my own frustrations, always believed in me.

This book was also made possible with financial assistance from the Graduate Opportunity Program, Office of Graduate Studies, and the UT history department; the history department, College of Liberal Arts and Social Sciences, and Center for Mexican American Studies at UH; dissertation and postdoctoral fellowships from the Ford Foundation; and a President's Postdoctoral Fellowship from the University of California.

Research for the book benefited greatly from the kindness of many librarians and archivists and their willingness to share their time and expertise. I especially appreciate aid from the staffs at the Perry Castañeda Library and the Nettie Lee Benson Library at UT; the Department of Special Collections at the University of California, Los Angeles; the Southern California Library for Social Studies and Research; the Huntington Library and Art Gallery; the Department of Special Collections at California State University, Long Beach; the Department of Special Collections at Stanford University; the Municipal Archives in New York City; the Schomburg Center for Black Research; and the National Archives and Records Administration, Pacific Region (Laguna Niguel).
