

Acknowledgments

It's a lie that scholarly work takes place in splendid isolation, or maybe I just need more help than most. But this project was born of the inspiration of many people and places, and has been shaped by all those willing to help, listen, support, disagree, and make suggestions. Its earliest genesis was in the lively intellectual and activist community of Boston, where those involved with the Reproductive Rights Network, Sojourner, Gay Community News, and Fenway Community Health Center taught me how to ask questions about medicine, science, and health and how they shaped the politics of gender, race, and imperialism. In Santo Domingo, the feminists of the Centro de Investigación para Acción Femenina and the crumbling infrastructure of the city itself, pushed me to think about the supposed beneficence of “development” and its history.

This book began as a dissertation in Brown University's American Civilization Department, where it benefited immensely from that confluence of smart people. I particularly thank my dissertation director, Mari Jo Buhle, who provided this project with wise guidance, and readers Anne Fausto-Sterling and Nancy Armstrong. Others who contributed in invaluable ways include Sarah Leavitt, Sarah Purcell, Caroline Cortina, Marie Myers, Laura Prieto Chesterton, Jane Lancaster, Lisa Duggan, Len Tennenhouse, Paul Buhle, Neil Lazarus, Robert Lee, Jen Ting, Jessica Shubow, Melani McAlister, Gail Bederman, DeWitt Kilgore, Anna Pegler Gordon, Rich Meckel, Cynthia Tolentino, Nate Schellenbach, and Beth Kling.

The research phase of this book was aided by grants from the Rockefeller Archives Center, Johnson and Johnson, and the Woodrow Wilson Foundation. Archivists are crucial to the doing of history, and this project is no exception. I want to thank archivist Tom Rosenbaum of the Rockefeller Archive Center; Mitchell Yockelson, Military Reference Branch, National Archives and Records Administration; Richard and Elin Wolfe and the staff of the Rare Book Room, Countway Library of Medicine, Harvard University; and Aura Jiménez, of the Colección Puertorriqueña of the Biblioteca del Recinto de Ciencias Medicas. Numerous reference librarians helped me locate obscure information, including especially Ruth Dickstein, University of Arizona Library; the staff of the Boston Public Library; and in Puerto Rico, the staffs of the Colección Puertorriqueña of the Biblioteca Lázare and of the Biblioteca Monserrate Santana de Palés de Trabajo Social.

Materials from the Rockefeller Archives and Countway and Schlesinger Libraries are used with permission.

In Puerto Rico, I was met with exceptional help. I want to thank Idalia Colón Rodón, former director of the Asociación Puertorriqueña Pro Bienestar de la Familia, for thoughtful conversation and her deep and sensitive knowledge of the birth control movement's history on the island; the staff of the Asociación's Centro de Planificación Familiar Celestina Zalduondo for allowing me to take over their conference room for several days; Dr. Rafael Quinquilla of that organization; Dr. Karlis Adamsons, head of ob/gyn at the University of Puerto Rico's Medical School; and Dr. Adalberto Fuertes de la Haba. Numerous scholars at the University of Puerto Rico helped me hone this project and offered research suggestions, including Judith Rodríguez, Ana Luisa Dávila, Liliana Ramos Collado, and Alice Colón, who shared with me her extensive research notes from insular newspapers.

I received crucial research assistance from Yudith Arreguin and Tania and Gwen Lanphere, and administrative help from Lauren Johnson.

The writing of this book was facilitated by the financial and intellectual support of a fellowship at the Charles Warren Center for Studies in American History at Harvard University, and, at the University of Arizona, a junior sabbatical, a Social and Behavior Sciences Research Institute Small Grant, a grant from the Provost's office, and a Women's Studies Advisory Committee grant. I presented parts of this research to a number of audiences, all of whom helped it immeasurably, and some of whom kept me from embarrassing mistakes. I am particularly grateful to my colleagues at the University of Arizona in the History Department colloquium; in the Sex, Race, and Globalization seminar; and in the Comparative Cultural and Literary Studies colloquium; at the University of Michigan's Institute of Advanced Studies "Aftermath of Empire" seminar; and at Harvard's Charles Warren Center seminar, all of whom made intensive time and space to help me with this work. I also want to thank my students at the University of Arizona, who provided a thoughtful and critical audience for many of the ideas in this book, and who always asked challenging questions.

This project is immeasurably stronger for many people's generosity with that most scarce of academic commodities—time. I am indebted to many people who read parts of it: Karen Anderson, Warwick Anderson, Yamila Azize Vargas, Sanjoy Bhattacharya, Truman Clark, Mark Garrett Cooper, Susan Craddock, Sarah Deutsch, Myra Dinnerstein, Kate Dudley, Sharla Fett, Marlene Fried, Ramón Gutiérrez, Donna J. Guy, Evelynnn Maxine Hammonds, Nancy Rose Hunt, Janet Jakobsen, Miranda Joseph, Elizabeth L. Kennedy, Kari McBride, Jan Monk, Mark Nichter, Ana Teresa Ortiz, James T. Patterson, Susan Phillips, Barbara Rosenkrantz, Johanna Schoen, Banu Subramaniam, and Carmen Whalen.

Many people at the University of California Press helped make this a better book, and I owe a debt of gratitude to them all. In particular, I want to thank Monica McCormick, whose sense of humor and understanding got this project through some rough patches. Peggy Pascoe and George Lipsitz each read the entire manuscript twice, and their generous readings and detailed, incisive critiques helped immeasurably.

Finally, I want to thank Liz Hill, Don Hernstrom, and Madeleine Hernstrom-Hill, who opened their home to me repeatedly so I could do work in Boston; Santiago and Francia Ortiz, who put me up while I was in Puerto Rico; and my parents, Karen Williams and Adam Briggs. My family, Ana Ortiz and Maribel Inzunza Briggs Ortiz, lived with this project and helped it along.
