Acknowledgments

My first thanks must go to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, without whom I would not be here. Literally: I would not be in the United States. More importantly, without their inquiries about whether I had committed a crime of moral turpitude, been a member of the Communist Party, or intended to become a prostitute, I would never have thought to study immigration policy. Without their instructions to turn my head to reveal my ear when being photographed for my green card, I would never have wondered about immigration photography. I didn't come to the United States to study. I came because I married a U.S. citizen. However, this journey has brought me more than I ever imagined when I immigrated.

This book began as a question about the way I was photographed during my immigration experience, and it continued life as a research paper and a dissertation. Throughout my studies, in England and the United States, I have been fortunate to have teachers who didn't give me answers but taught me how to question. Above all, my dissertation committee members at the University of Michigan, George Sánchez, Richard Cándida Smith, and Rebecca Zurier, have gone beyond their duties to support me as a student and a colleague. They have inspired me with their learning, their intellectual generosity, and their friendship. I could not have hoped for better mentors. Although Mary Panzer joined my committee at a later date, she has been an exemplary reader as well as a friend. I also want to recognize the special contribution of Robert G. Lee to this study. I formed the basis of this project in my first graduate seminar at Brown University, and although my focus was on Ellis Island photography, it was Bob who suggested that the story might start instead at Angel Island. I am grateful to each teacher who has guided my studies but especially to Tony Branch, Neil Clark, Tim Cunningham, and Carrie Lynch at Billericay School; Jean Gooder and Susan Manning at Newnham College, Cambridge University; Nancy Armstrong, Mari Jo Buhle, Mary Ann Doane, Shepherd Krech III, Patrick Malone, and Susan Smulyan at Brown University; and June Howard, Joanne Leonard, Maria Montoya, David Scobey, Carroll Smith-Rosenberg, Ann Stoler, and Steve Sumida at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. Like all great teachers, they have given me more than they know or than I can repay.

Throughout my career, I have been lucky to have friends become colleagues and colleagues become friends. The steadfast friendship of Susette Min, Nhi Lieu, Brian Locke, and Theresa Macedo Pool buoyed me through graduate school. At both Brown University and the University of Michigan, I became part of a community of engaged scholars, including especially Chloe Burke, Paul Ching, Catherine Daligga, Colin Johnson, Clara Kawanishi, Shawn Kimmel, Robin Li, Carla McKenzie, John Nichols, Mark Rogers, Nick Syrett, Jen Tilton, Wilson Valentin-Escobar, and Stacy Washington. I also want to recognize my longtime friends Deb Gordon-Gurfinkel, Elli Gurfinkel, Alice Hewitt, Claudia Malloy, Bridget Mazzey, Stephanie Meadows, Sarah Prettejohns, Usha Subbuswamy, and Hannah Worrall. Susan Manes, Carlene Stephens, Selma Thomas, and Julia Grant have been true mentors, generous and honest. At Michigan State University, I have enjoyed teaching with and learning from Allison Berg, Andaluna Borcila, Gene Burns, Joe Cousins, Maggie Chen Hernandez, Meaghan Kozar, Louise Jezierski, Andrea Louie, and Kate O'Sullivan See. I have found a very welcome home at the James Madison College of Michigan State University and have been able to help create a second home at the Asian Pacific American Studies Program. My thanks to all the faculty and staff at both locations and to Dean Sherman Garnett for supporting my traveling between them.

This book would still be a question if it weren't for the shared insights and encouragement of my writing group partners who have read all or parts of this book, often more than once. My deep gratitude to these great friends and readers: Kimberley Alidio, Kirsten Fermaglich, John McKiernan-Gonzalez, Richard Kim, Nsenga Lee, Nhi Lieu, Mindy Morgan, Stephen Rohs, and Cynthia Wu. Tom Nehil, Carly Wunderlich, and Allison Meyer provided essential research assistance. Evelyn Hu-Dehart and Judy Yung kindly answered my questions and made very helpful observations about this work. The manuscript also benefited immensely from the support of the American Crossroads series editors, the comments of two anonymous University of California Press readers, and George Lipsitz's insightful reading. I also deeply appreciate the thoughtful support and guidance of my editor, Niels Hooper, and the careful attention of Rachel Lockman, Kate Warne, Elisabeth Magnus, and Nick Arrivo.

This project has taken me to California, Texas, New York, Pennsylvania, and Washington, D.C. In each place, I have benefited from the knowledge and openness of many archivists and librarians. In particular, I would like to thank Neil Thomsen, Michael Frush, and William Greene of the National Archives in San Bruno, California; Suzanne Harris and Claire Kluskens of the National Archives, Washington, D.C.; Marian Smith and Zack Wilske at the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services History Office; Barry Moreno and Jeffrey Dosik at the Ellis Island Immigration Museum; Wei Chi Poon at the University of California, Berkeley; David Kessler at the Bancroft Library; Christian Kelleher at the University of Texas at Austin; Claudia Rivers at the University of Texas at El Paso; Hui Hua Chua at Michigan State University; and the librarians of the American Museum of Natural History, the Balch Institute for Ethnic Studies (now part of the Pennsylvania Historical Society), the California Historical Society, the New York Public Library, and the Library of Congress Prints and Photographs Division.

Throughout this study, I have had the good fortune of support from the University of Michigan, Michigan State University, and the Immigration and Ethnic History Society. At the University of Michigan, I was supported by fellowships from the Rackham Graduate School, the Center for the Education of Women, the Institute for the Humanities, and the Office of Academic Multicultural Initiatives. At Michigan State University, I have received support from the Intramural Research Grants Program and the James Madison College Faculty Development and Founders' Funds. I also received welcome recognition and research funds from the Immigration and Ethnic History Society George E. Pozzetta Dissertation Award.

In many of these settings, from my enrollment in a women's college at Cambridge University to various fellowships, I have benefited from both informal and established affirmative action programs. As a white woman and nontraditional student, I recognize the importance of these programs to my educational and professional development, to my presence in the academy, and to the intellectual contributions this support has allowed me to make. Like the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which allowed me to enter the United States, I would not be here if it were not for these affirmative action programs.

Even with such support, I could never have made this journey without my family: Toby, Ellen and David, Claire, Matilda and Scout, Lorna and Simon, Alvin and Felice, Mark and Pat, Joel and Bonnie, Ginger and Jim, Lyn and Rog, Don and Claire, and their families. They have given me everything I needed, most importantly a place not to think about my work! My daughters, Maya and Naomi, have lived with this project all their lives. They have made every day of writing (and not writing) more joyful than I thought possible. My greatest thanks must go to Neil, who has supported my work in every way and is simply the most wonderful person I could hope to spend my life with. When I handwrote my undergraduate thesis, he edited and typed it for me, and he has been making my life easier and better ever since. I've learned a lot since then, including how to type, but I'm not sure that I've learned enough ways to thank him for everything. Finally, I want to thank my parents. They are the most kind and wise people I have known, and I will always be grateful that they were my first teachers. My mum, Maggie, has been my best friend for as long as I can remember. Her life has shaped the course of my own, from her always avid reading to her decision to get an undergraduate degree with four young children at home. My dad, David, died shortly before I completed the dissertation on which this book is based. He never read many books, but his way of looking at and living in the world taught me more than I will ever learn from books, no matter how many I read.

An earlier version of portions of chapters 1 and 2 appeared as "Chinese Exclusion, Photography, and the Development of U.S. Immigration Policy," American Quarterly 58 (March 2006): 51-77.
