It is probably not obvious in these pages how much I owe to an African economic historian, Ralph Austen, for putting me on this path. The questions about the history of New Spain in a global frame began to percolate in his graduate course on European expansion and the postcolonial world. Friends, colleagues, and teachers from those Chicago days, now scattered across the United States, who made it such an incredible place to think about colonialism and whose influence continues to shape my thought include Andrew Apter, Dipesh Chakrabarty, John and Jean Comaroff, Robin Derby, Rachel Fulton, Jan Goldstein, Tamar Herzog, Joshua Kaplan, Daniel Klingensmith, John MacAloon, Maria Elena Martínez, Erica Peters, Paul Ross, David Scott, Alex Stern, and Shields Sundberg. I am forever indebted to the Chicago workshop system, those lovely thought laboratories dedicated to intellectual experimentation, fermentation, occasional explosion.

I owe much to institutions that, to my great delight, are committed to taking such great care of the records with which historians think and, yes, play. Thank you to the archivists and staff at the Archivo General de la Nación de México, Archivo Romanum Societatus Iesu, the Bancroft Library, the Biblioteca Nacional de España, Biblioteca Nacional de México, the Bibliothèqu St. Sèvres, Paris, and the Burns Collection at Boston College. Special thanks to Robin Rider at Special Collections at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, and to Leticia Ruíz Ramírez at the Biblioteca Eusebio F. Kino de la Provincia Mexicana.

My former colleagues and graduate students in the Department of History at University of California, Irvine, contributed much to this book. I thank Marc Baer, Nicole LaBouff, Kurt MacMillan, Laura Mitchell, and especially Ulrike Strasser, who continues to be a fabulous interlocutor. Thanks to Roxanne Varzi, friend and colleague whose gorgeous prose inspires; and finally, a shout-out to my hilarious colleagues and laid-back Irvine neighbors, Amy dePaul and Rodrigo Lazo.

The Women's Studies in Religion Program at Harvard Divinity School provided a magical year in which to write, not to mention a regular format for sharing work in progress with such smart women who, importantly, became very good friends. Thanks to Joan Branham, Anne Braude, Ronit Irshak, Mónica Maher, Miryam Segal, and Elizabeth Sutton for making the Carriage House a wonderfully productive place to think and write, not only about women, gender, and religion but, even more often, about life in general.

I brought this book to a close in the Department of Religious Studies at Northwestern University with the support of insightful colleagues and graduate students. Mira Balberg, Sarah Jacoby, and Barry Wimpfheimer comprised a team of incredibly supportive and inspiring junior faculty friends. It has been a privilege to poke my head out of my office door to find a cohort of impressive senior Catholic Studies scholars in Richard Kieckhefer, Robert Orsi, and Cristie Traina. Cristie and Richard have read numerous drafts and offered extended and quite brilliant feedback, for which I am of course very grateful. Perhaps like the late medieval and early modern Catholics whom I study, I wonder if I, mere mortal, can ever attain the sanctity of these exemplary figures. I have learned so much from a dazzlingly unique philosopher, Brook Ziporyn, a larger-than-life figure who is a bit hard to wrap one's head around, but therein lies the pleasure. I have loved teaching the graduate students at Northwestern and appreciated thinking, sparring, and laughing at the conference room table. Special thanks to a very sharp and dedicated graduate student, Kristi Bain, for her conversation and thoughtful readings of so many drafts of my work. I have drawn upon the brain power of scholars in the wider Northwestern community, notably Ken Alder, Yari Pérez Marín, and Claudia Swan. With great pleasure I acknowledge Mary Weismantel and Lars Tønder, who have shared in the immense fun of reading through the works of Maurice Merleau-Ponty in the Phenomenology Workshop sponsored by the Alice Kaplan Institute for the Humanities. AKIH has supported two other ventures of mine: a symposium, Vibrant Materiality: Religion, Embodiment and the Life of Things (2012), and what has become a biannual tradition of convening Jesuit studies scholars for a day-long roundtable (2009, 2011). Thanks to the scholars who have sat around the table to discuss the Society of Jesus: Steve Andes, Luke Clossey, Emanuele Colombo, Stephen Harris, Florence Hsia, Kristin Huffine, Karen Melvin, Kenneth Mills, Robert Orsi, Ulrike Strasser, Karin Vélez, and Thomas Worcester.

This book has been improved immensely by the feedback and conversations I have had with scholars at a variety of institutions. I presented preliminary parts of this book at a number of institutions, including Boston College, Harvard University, Holy Cross College, the University of Chicago, the University of Toronto, and the University of Wisconsin, Madison. The latter to be noted for its scintillating workshop on “Lived Inquiry.” Formal and informal conversations with Antonella Romano have been incredibly stimulating. Thank you to Alan Cole, for insightful hilarity and the wry editorial eye that he ran over the introduction. I am grateful to Florence Hsia for reading through an early draft of the manuscript, for being an excellent dinner companion, and for her infectious laughter. Ken Mills’s intellectual generosity is enjoyed by all of us in the field of colonial Latin American history and, over these many years, I have not only benefited from his informal mentorship, but also treasured his friendship. That the anonymous readers of the manuscript made this a better book is an understatement. Thanks to Jorge Cañizares-Esguerra, Matthew O’Hara, and Valentina Napolitano for their generous and insightful feedback.

Three cheers for Reed Malcolm, senior acquisitions editor at University of California Press, who has been a rock-solid source of support for this project. Thank you, Reed.

“How’s the book?”

“I can’t talk about it.”

Thanks to my parents for putting up with years of that tireless nonconversation, and love to my sisters, Jennifer, Johanna, and Erica, for their steady support and shared laughter about things large and small, happy and tragic. I nod toward the long history I have shared with Gary Wong, who has done much to make my academic life very possible.

Two sisters, two kids, and three dogs? Special thanks to Jennifer for engaging in these periodic experiments in domestic living wherein we have agreed with Woody Allen that we do not belong to that very special group called “the horrible,” rather, we prefer to be lumped in with the merely “miserable.” The ensuing laughter has done much to release the pressure valve on single parenting. Thanks to friends and family who wander in and out the front door, making domestic life a little more like living in a village. Love to a brave band of women who crossed oceans to put an interesting accent on the venture of raising kids: thank you to Camille George, Naïma Bouaziz, and Mirka Lassakova. I am eternally grateful to Pamela Lui and George Bucciero, whose love, support, frequent dinners, and memorable nights at local music venues have been essential to surviving these past few years; love and thanks to my adopted extended family, Simon Aronoff and Mary Weismantel; to Barb Ciesemier, who navigates this post-divorce world with me; to Barry Wimpfheimer, my friend and academic comrade in arms; to Brook Ziporyn, with whom I negotiated a tequila-for-music exchange; to my wry yogi, Lane Fenrich; to Andrew Jankowski, my interpreter of dreams; to Jackie Winter, who shares her fabulous colonial art books with me; to Liz Fitzgerald and Lisa Lipkind for being such wonderful and much-anticipated extended guests; to Nils Halverson, for his enduring friendship; to Ana Maria Apodaca, my touchstone since sixth grade; and to the baristas and regulars at Peet's who make scholarly life anything but scholarly.

I dedicate this book to my boys, the absolute best sources of love, challenge, and enjoyment in my life.
