

Acknowledgments

The current climate in the social sciences remains open to broad methodological discussion. The Department of Sociology at Northwestern University is an especially conducive setting for asking difficult and troubling questions. I am indebted to the entire department for its unique ambience. I am especially grateful for the detailed comments provided by my colleagues Arthur Stinchcombe and John Stephens on early drafts of this manuscript and to many other colleagues at Northwestern—especially Janet Abu-Lughod, Howard Becker, Arnold Feldman, Jack Goldstone, Christopher Jencks, Charles Moskos, and Christopher Winship—for their many helpful suggestions and moral support. Also, York Bradshaw and Jeremy Hein offered a lot of suggestions and assisted with some of the more mundane aspects of producing this document.

I would also like to thank a number of former colleagues at Indiana University, especially Larry Griffin, David Zaret, Bill Corsaro, and Tom Gieryn. Scholars elsewhere also have provided useful comments and advice. Among them are Daniel Chirot, Kriss Drass, and John Walton. John Walton, in particular, offered many detailed suggestions and much needed encouragement in the final stages of writing. I am very indebted to him for his help. The readers for the University of California Press provided excellent advice. Last but not least, I am also thankful to the American Bar Foundation and the Center for Urban Affairs and Policy Research for their financial support of my investigation of broad issues in social science methodology.

This page intentionally left blank