

Acknowledgments

Many people have inspired, supported, and assisted me in carrying out the research and writing for this book. UC Press editor Naomi Schneider has been a wonderful guide throughout the manuscript preparation process, and I'm thankful for her enthusiasm in promoting my project and for the diligent assistance of Ally Power and my copy editor Lindsey Westbrook. I have also benefited enormously from comments on earlier drafts of this book from Cecilia Menjivar, Seth Holmes, and an anonymous UC Press reviewer. In addition, I thank Roger Waldinger for his careful reading, critical reactions, and enthusiastic support of this research. The final manuscript also was improved thanks to feedback from Mara Loveman and Helen Marrow. Generous grants and fellowships from the Graduate School at the University of North Carolina, the Center for the Study of the American South at UNC, the National Science Foundation, the UCLA Institute for Research on Labor and Employment, and the Faculty Career Development Program at UCSD have provided much-needed assistance along the way.

I have been extremely fortunate in life to have the mentorship of two extraordinary scholars. Shahnaz Rouse, my mentor at Sarah Lawrence College, sharpened my analytical senses and nurtured in me an outrage toward injustice. Shahnaz taught me that the best questions are difficult to answer and that there are only better answers to difficult questions. Her intellectual integrity and passion for teaching are legacies worth emulating. My doctoral advisor, Jacqueline M. Hagan, was a stalwart advocate on my behalf from the time I began my graduate studies at Carolina. Dr. Hagan traveled a long road with me over the seven years it took me to complete the PhD and remains a caring mentor and friend. I owe Jackie an enormous debt of gratitude for the many, many hours that she devoted to advising me, deciphering my ideas and helping me develop them, and pushing me to write the stories contained in this book as they deserve to be told.

I am also thankful to have had the support and critical feedback of Arne Kallenberg, Ted Mouw, Charlie Kurzman, Kenneth (Andy) Andrews, and Jacquelyn Hall on my dissertation committee at UNC. I also appreciate the comments and suggestions of Karolyn Tyson and members of the UNC Race Workshop. My colleagues in the sociology department at UCSD have also provided much encouragement and guidance in the book writing process, especially Amy Binder and Jeff Haydu, and also David Fitzgerald and Tom Medvetz.

My mom, Gayle Ribas, and sister, Mel Ribas, provided stable anchors outside the world of hog country during the course of fieldwork for this book, and have been constant sources of support and confidence throughout this long process. Beyond that, I am thankful to my mother for always allowing me to pursue my intellectual curiosities wherever these took me, and for the many sacrifices she made without a second thought in order to make that possible.

I reserve the deepest admiration for the women and men with whom I worked at Swine's and who assisted me in one way or another in my research. It is my hope that at least some small benefit can come their way from the publication and dissemination of this book, although my personal debt to them can never be repaid. I feel the sincerest gratitude and affection for those close friends I made while living and working in rural North Carolina. I learned more about strength and perseverance through pain and difficulties, and about the life-affirming properties of humor and humility, from these worker-friends in a couple of years than I had in my entire life. The irony of not being able to properly name these women and men in my acknowledgments does not escape me. The unmatched kindness and generosity that Mayra, Ivonne, and Gladys showed me is not to be forgotten. It was also my good fortune to get to know Pete, La Siquitraqui, Berta, and Kiki, all of whom immensely enriched my experiences on and off the line.
