My mother, Josephine, was a gentle woman who threatened more than she punished. I remember the numerous times that she warned, “Wait until your father gets home.” Even when I had behaved in a manner that warranted his discipline, I was still excited when my daddy came home. As an adult, I continued to experience pure joy whenever I was blessed with my father’s presence. Although my daddy died over nine years ago, sometimes I can hear his voice clearly, giving me direction and encouragement. Joe Lewis was a daddy and not just a father. He would have enjoyed reading this book because it emphasizes the importance of the father-child relationship. I am so grateful that I got to spend the first forty years of my life in his care.

During the course of preparing this book, I endured a funeral and a flood. I could not have completed the book without the grace of God. I give all thanks to Him for enabling me to overcome obstacles to finish the book. I thank my paternal siblings, Emma S., Joe, Batt, Evon, Don, Ora Bell, and Emma L., for sharing their memories of our dad. As single parents, my sisters all raised their children without the benefit of fathers. Nonetheless, they understand that it is critical that children receive support from their fathers. I thank Coré Cotton, my BFF, for sharing her dad with me after my daddy died.

I could not have completed the book without the encouragement and support I received from the members of my scholarship support group at Cleveland-Marshall College of Law: Kris Niedringhaus, Heidi Robertson, Alan Weinsein, Kermit Lind, and Dena Davis. They read the roughest of drafts and still found something positive to say about it. For an entire week, Professor Matthew Green and I stayed at the law school until the wee hours of the morning working on our writing. During that time, Matthew supplied me with the pep talks and candy that I needed to finally bring the book to life. I am also grateful for the financial support that I received from Deans Geoffrey Mearns and Phyllis Crocker and from the Cleveland-Marshall Fund.

At New York University Press, I appreciate all of the support I received from editor Deborah Gershenowitz. Debbie encouraged me to turn my idea into a book and waited patiently for me to complete it. Finally, I thank Gabrielle Begue for her calmness and support in the face of my actual and figurative storms.
