I often complain to colleagues, family, and friends that I have a bad habit of picking research topics that stress me out; nonetheless, I am quite fortunate to have people and institutions supporting me as I do the research and writing. I owe a lot of my productivity to the FOCI Writers' Group at the University of Minnesota. I am so glad we pulled it together, and that we're still going strong two years later. When I get writers' block, it's good to know folks are counting on me to set up our writing space so we can all get motivated. Many thanks and hugs to Mary Vavrus for reading early drafts of the Parenthood chapters, and for well-timed family dinners and venting sessions. I owe you, sister, and can't wait for your next book to drop!

I received valuable feedback on the news chapter when I visited the Rhetorical Studies Group at the University of Illinois. Conversations with Kent Ono, Cara Finnegan, and their colleagues and students were right on time for my revision cycle. Likewise, Daniel Brouwer and his colleagues at Arizona State University gave me a warm welcome and feedback that helped me work out ideas for the conclusion of the book. And although my mother, Helen, and sisters, Theresa and Leah, are excellent editors and sounding boards, any and all errors are my own. Thanks again for all the phone calls and tweeted encouragement—in addition to everything else over the years. Most of this research would not have been accomplished had I not received generous funding at two universities. Much of the work on Justice Sunday III was supported by a grant from the Howard R. Marsh Center at the University of Michigan. The other chapters were researched and written using funds from the Cowles Chair for Journalism, Diversity, and Equality at the University of Minnesota. Without these sources of support, I would never have been able to hire such excellent research assistants: Sarah J. Jackson (now Professor Jackson!), Meagan Manning, Anna Popkova, and the amazing Ruth De Foster.

As always, I am extremely grateful for the continuous supply of affection and strength I get from my better mathematical half, Bryan, and our twins, Will and Helena. I am happy to now have more time to thank them for their support.
