My thoughts here begin and end with David. In between, those thoughts turn to my family and friends, North, East, South, and West. They are my bookends.

My thoughts linger on all of the disabled women and men, and allies, who form my community, and rest on a number who have been invaluable in shaping this book: Barbara Waxman-Fiduccia, Corbett O'Toole, Marsha Saxton, Paul Longmore, Anthony Tusler, Adrienne Asch, Harlan Hahn, Steve Brown, David Pfeiffer, Kate Seelman, the late Irv Zola, and others, mentioned below. I can't imagine a more astute, and irreverent group of friends and colleagues, a more enveloping community, a stronger more committed group of activists and scholars.

Significantly, Harilyn Rousso and Rosemarie Garland Thomson were irreplaceable. They read gallons of words and thought through every large and small problem with me. And made it fun and delicious.

Conversations with the MLA dinner committee (Lennard Davis, Brenda Brueggeman, Georgina Kleege, Ellen Steckert, David Mitchell, Sharon Snyder, Nancy Mairs, Phyllis Franklin, Harilyn Rousso, and Rosemarie Garland Thomson) and with the members of the Society for Disability Studies bedroom committees convinced me that disability studies was the most invigorating home base from which to work.

Many people read or heard pieces of the manuscript and were generous with their time and incisive in their thinking. Thank you all: Lee Bell, Tanis Doe, Carol Gill, Rickie Solinger, Elizabeth Kamarck Minnich, Phyllis Rubenfeld, Stanley Aronowitz, Michelle Fine, Sonia Nieto, Paula Mayhew, Richard Weiner, Mike Hill, Dorothy Helly, Michael Bérubé, and Bob Vorlicky.

It was with my colleagues Susan Mello and John O'Neill at the Disability Studies Project at Hunter that I first began to formulate the ideas for this book. They contributed ideas, words, roast beef sandwiches, and loads of inspiration.

Thanks to my assistants, particularly Myrtila Tomlinson, Michelle Malek, Zachery Miller, and Julie Smore, for all their help.

Great thanks to Eric Zinner, my editor at New York University Press, and to Michael Bérubé, the editor of the Cultural Front series that I am privileged to be a part of.

The National Institute of Disability and Rehabilitation Research provided the Switzer Distinguished Fellowship that gave me the time to conduct the research and to write. Thank you for that support.

Great thanks to my sister, Florence Weiner, for forging a path as the first writer in the family, for her commitments, her moral center, and for her wonderful, wacky take on the world.

And I acknowledge, with great gusto and love, David, the gravity and helium in my life, the smartest man on eight wheels, the delight of all time.
