

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This study would not have been possible without the generosity of time, insight, and emotion of the adoptees and social workers I interviewed. I wish to thank the social workers I spoke with for teaching me what the adoption world looks like from their perspective, as well as for the enormous help many of them provided me in my search for adoptees to interview. I am particularly indebted to the twenty-two transracial adoptees who shared their narratives about their lives and identities with me. For many of them, and certainly for myself, these interviews were profound, intense encounters that not only shaped this research, but also our sense of self as adoptees. I am deeply grateful to them for the stories they shared with me.

I would like to thank my teachers and mentors at the University of Maryland, College Park, for their generous support and wise counsel throughout the research and writing of this study. I am particularly indebted to my dissertation advisor, John L. Caughey, whose thoughtful and meditative guidance, reflective questions, and generous insights into questions of identity, culture, and consciousness were invaluable. I am deeply grateful to Bonnie Thornton Dill for her thoughtful engagement in and incisive perspective on the issues of families, children, women, and race that we are both so committed to, as well as her graceful example as a politically engaged scholar-activist. I must thank Deborah S. Rosenfelt for initially suggesting adoption as a dissertation topic. Our common personal connections to the subject have fueled provocative and fruitful discussions during the course of this research, and her generous insights and unflagging support have contributed immeasurably to its completion. In addition, Claire Moses, Michael Agar, Myron Lounsbury, and Rhonda Williams have contributed enormously to this study.

I am indebted to Rickie Solinger for her profoundly helpful comments and critiques. Her research on single pregnancy and her suggestions when I was revising my dissertation for publication were invaluable. I also thank Lisa Disch for her cogent suggestions and valuable criticism. I am deeply grateful to the critical acumen and unwavering support of my friends Dabrina Taylor, Eva George, Lillie Ransom, Psyche Williams, Sharon Kirkland, Debra DeRuyver, Laine Snowman, Kerry Brooks, Sara Dorow, Mark McCandless, S. P. Udayakumar, and Miranda Rosenfelt. I thank Jennifer Holt for her research assistance.

I am enormously grateful to my family, whose support as well as personal reflections and insights on their experiences with adoption enriched this study. I am indebted to my mother Lois Patton, my sister Nancy Patton, my birth mother, who wishes to remain anonymous, and particularly my sister Diane Hollingsworth. Diane listened endlessly to my reflections and questions about what it means to be adopted, and her perspectives were invaluable. I also thank Josh and Casey Hollingsworth.

I am grateful to the American Association of University Women for awarding me an American Fellowship that allowed me to devote a full year to writing. I would like to thank the University of Maryland's Africa and Africa in the Americas Project for a travel grant to conduct field-work. I am grateful to the American Studies Association for Annette K. Baxter Travel Grants that provided travel expenses to two conferences where I presented papers based on this work. I thank the University of Maryland, College Park, for awarding me a Jacob K. Goldhaber Travel Grant that also facilitated travel to a conference where I presented a paper based on this research. I thank the Institute on Race and Poverty at the University of Minnesota Law School for their support during my postdoctoral fellowship there.

I am deeply grateful to my partner, M. Imani, for enormous patience, support, and belief in me; for reading drafts so many times the words blurred together; and for critical engagement in our seemingly endless dialogues on adoption, gender, race, and identity.
