We dedicate this book to the people who have borne the brunt of the wars in Afghanistan, Iraq, and Pakistan—namely, civilians and uniformed forces living in the war zones, and US veterans and their families. We hope that the story we tell pushes governments one step closer to understanding the costs of war on health, and consequently, to creating more peaceful and humane public policies.

We also thank the growing team of the Costs of War Project, who include scholars, physicians, and activists from around the world who do brave and important work telling the story of how these wars devastate people and their communities.
