The founding teachers of Dometown High School – Susan, Jason and Rachel – made this ethnographic study of a high school possible by making Dometown High a reality.

What an ethnographer most wants are access and honesty. I thank the three principle classroom teachers and their students who allowed me open access to their classrooms for over a year. I hope this book accurately and honestly documents both their successes and their failures in the first year of a new, charter high school.

My experience doing ethnographic research at Dometown High School helped me to understand the complexities surrounding minority student education, specifically, Spanish heritage language issues. Because I am a Spanish heritage language learner myself, my research time at Dometown High helped me to understand myself better as it taught me to better appreciate my Nicaraguan heritage.

My mother was born in Nicaragua and spent her first 11 years there. The transition for her – from Spanish language/culture to English/US culture – was difficult, but she did it, very successfully. Marta became a United States Citizen, but without ever losing her Nicaraguan identity. I thank Mama, Marta Adilia Helmer, for everything she has done for me. She has helped me selflessly all of my life.

My father, Dr James John Helmer, teaches me every day to love learning for learning's sake and to love human life for its own sake. My Papa is a perfect example of a professional who loves both scholarship and humanity. Papa taught both me and my brother the importance of doing smart work in the theoretical world and good and practical work in the material world. I thank my brother, Jimmy, for learning to learn with me: Jim Junior is a good doctor and teacher in the world and I respect him for that.

To McKenzie who has come to almost every presentation I have made as well as every award ceremony I have been part of. He has supported me in my career, most of all, by being there. Although he does not consider himself a critical pedagogue, he is a righteous good teacher and amazing writer. I have learned a lot from him.

Writing is not easy for me: I need support and I got it from my writing group: Drs Nolvía Cortéz, Beth Specker, Jill McCracken, Erica Reynolds and Leigh Jones. They suggested relevant literature, asked the right questions and pushed me to be explicit in my writing and clear in the organization of my material. I appreciate their friendship and support. These smart women made writing fun for me and made me a more functional and intellectual academic.

I also thank Guadalupe Valdés who first inspired me with her ethnography, Con Respeto. So under the influence, I unconsciously named this book after another of her books without realizing it until after I sent the manuscript off to the publisher. During the editing process of “my” Learning and Not Learning, Guadalupe Valdés provided invaluable feedback, and I thank her for that.

Finally, as this is a book about teaching, I thank my teachers, Mrs. Indranee Wijesekera, Drs. Mary Wildner-Bassett, Susan Phillips, Perry Gilmore, Norma Mendoza-Denton, Leo van Lier and Lynn Goldstein. These educators have carved paths in the academic and intellectual world. That sounds a bit cliché, but there it is – these scholars have been the role models for my generation of scholars, ethnographers, intellectuals and writers. Not only have they been role models for dedicated teaching and exemplary scholarship, but they have also made the world a smarter and better place.
