

Acknowledgements

I have to thank first the contributors to this volume for their efforts and support. All of them responded so positively to requests for chapters that I fear at times I drew too heavily on their good natures. Above all, I appreciate their patience as they cooperated with all of my often-unreasonable requests for editorial changes, deletions and even additions, sometimes at very short notice. Without their efforts there would, of course, have been no book. I hope my interpretations and comments on their chapters at various points in the volume meet with their approval, or at least acceptance, because they have added a great deal to the discussions on the old Tourism Area Life Cycle (TALC) model and attempts to bring it somewhat up to date.

Second, my thanks go to Sarah Williams and the team at Channel View who have put up with my editorial works over the past quarter century and still had the patience to work with me again. I felt sorry for Sarah in that her main work on this volume began as England failed to regain the Ashes but despite that disappointment, she remained a positive driving force in completing the book, and I very much appreciate her support from the onset of the project.

I would like personally to thank my daughter Antonia for her long-distance assistance with redrawing the TALC model and other graphics. She will, I am sure, be as glad to see the end of TALC books as I am but will probably have to suffer further calls on her skills to assist an ageing parent.

Finally, my thanks to those fellow academics, from undergraduates to emeritus professors, who have been interested enough to engage with the TALC and its implications over the past four decades, and particularly to the many who have made useful suggestions, criticisms and modifications to the model. I hope this book has addressed appropriately at least some of the concerns and ideas that have emerged over the years.

Richard Butler